VOLUME XL, PART II.

CONGRESSIONAL RECORD,

FIFTY-NINTH CONGRESS, FIRST SESSION.

resent those who sent us here and intrusted great interests in our hands.

No, Mr. Chairman, no legislation which strikes at the trust will be passed by this Congress. I know there are gentlemen on both sides of this Chamber who ardently desire to see some measure enacted into law which will strike at the criminal trust. I have never believed that my political party had a monopoly of civic virtue, and I am glad to hear testimony of the patriotic purposes of gentlemen on the other side of the isle; but, unfortunately, as I believe, the party in power is under obligations to the very corporations the people expect us to deal with. While I believe the rules of this House are abominable and arbitrary, it is hardly fair to blame the Speaker for exercising the power which has been placed in his hands, but with all my heart and soul I contend that the time has come for the Members of this House to abolish this oligarchy and to teach the three or four men who monopolize most of the time of the House and wield all its power that they are the servants and not the masters of the American House of Representatives. Right here I will venture to repeat a prediction I made during the last Congress on this floor. It is this: Any legislation which affects railroad rates will result in no practical benefit to the shipper. The Republican party can not legislate against the railroad. It can not legislate against the trust, for it would by so doing legislate against itself. Colonel Roosevelt has been President for nearly six years. Every day during that period his party has had control of both Houses of Congress. You can pass any bill you desire to pass. Again and again the President has denounced the vicious and criminal practices of the trust. Again and again he has called attention to the need of railroad-rate legislation. Why don't you do something? The beet-sugar farmer says you are about to strike at him. The tobacco farmer says you are about to strike at him. Why don't you strike at the trust? Why don't you repeal the duty on refined sugar—that little differential which was put there to help the trust? Oh, no, Mr. Chairman, the big corporation is safe. It can be relied on when money is needed to run your campaign.

Now, Mr. Chairman, there is much in the President which a political foe can admire. He is honest, courageous, intensely American. For one I am glad to support him in many of his recommendations. I am in full sympathy with his spirit of independence. I have never subscribed to the doctrine that the party is greater than the man. Violent partisanism is not a healthy condition. Political parties become a curse when they obstruct the passage of beneficent laws. I am a Democrat because, before God, I believe the principles of my party, as I understand them, are right. It is of but little concern to the millions of American people who are affected by the laws we pass whether they are initiated by the one party or the other. I confess there is but little in the pending measure to commend it. I will not pledge myself to do so, yet I expect to vote for it, because it is a very short step in the right direction.

In conclusion, there is one other matter to which I will allude. To-day at the White House myself and wife were looking at the portraits of the great men who have occupied the Presidential chair of the grandest of all the nations of the earth. At one of these long and reverently we gazed in silence, for upon his countenance there was a look of heaven which limners give to the beloved disciple. It was the portrait of the greatest soul ever elevated to the Presidential office—Abraham Lincoln, the martyr.

Just as we were about to leave the building, again we stopped to look in reverent silence upon the kindly features of yet another President, who did not live in such a trying hour in the life of the Republic, but who left behind a memory so gentle and sweet that every American will always speak his name with pride. It is the portrait of McKinley, the martyr.

And then, as the car approached the Capitol, we passed the statue of still another President—a statue built by his comrades in arms to honor the memory of the soldier, statesman, and patriot. It was the statue of Garfield, the martyr.

And then I was reminded that one out of every eight Presidents who held the office before Colonel Roosevelt died at the hands of a miserable assassin. The President is compelled to see thousands of people. Let us not be too hasty or too harsh in our criticisms of those of the President's household whose duty it is to be always on guard. [Loud applause.]

Mr. FRENCH. Mr. Chairman, it is after a great deal of hesitation that I address this body upon the question that has been attracting its attention for most of the time during the past week—the tariff bill as affects the Philippine Islands. Anyone to speak upon this measure should not only be in earnest in the cause that he represents, but he should be thoroughly informed upon the principles and the workings of the tariff question. He should be fully acquainted with the conditions of our own country, the conditions in the Philippine Islands and our responsibilities thereto, and last of all, he should weigh carefully the effect of the passage of this bill upon an industry that the Republican party has sought to build up for the benefit of the American farmer, the American wage-earner, and the American consumer.

I feel my limitations, but with utmost care I have gone through the testimony that has been offered before committees and commissions. I have read what the friends of the bill assert and its enemies declare. I have conversed with those who have made a personal examination of the Philippine Islands and the sugar industry there, and I have followed through many hours the debate upon this measure, and yet, while I confess a hesitation that is due in the consideration of a great question, I am more fully convinced than I was when the debate began that a wrong will be done in the passage of this bill.

This bill proposes to place upon the free list all products of the Philippine Islands brought into the United States, except sugar and tobacco. These latter two products, it is provided, shall pay 25 per cent of the Dingley rate for a period of a little more than three years, after which time they shall be admitted free. I do not care to address myself to any phase of this question other than the proposed reduction of the tariff on sugar. This phase I believe to be the most important one and, indeed, my objection to it shall determine my vote upon the bill.

CONTRARY TO POLICY OF PROTECTION.

I am opposed to this bill because I regard it as a blow against the principle upon which the Republican party has stood since it was born a half century ago beneath the oaks of Michigan. Since that time it has stood for the policy of a protective tariff to American industries that need protection, and since that time and under that policy we have seen our industries develop, our country prosper, our laborers better paid, and our millions of homes happier than those in any other land. Strangely enough, and contrary to what has been stated upon this floor to-day by Democratic leaders, that same year, a half century ago, the Democratic party adopted a platform upon which Mr. Buchanan was elected President, which declared in so many words for free trade—for "progressive free trade," as they chose to call it. Democratic administration has brought failure, and Republican administration has brought success. The Democratic party finds its last practical demonstration in the period of Grover Cleveland, and the Republican party the acme of its realization at the dawn of the new century in the greatest era of prosperity our country has ever known under the wise Administrations of the last two Republican Presidents.

REPUBLICAN PROMISES TO BEET-SUGAR INDUSTRY.

The beet-sugar industry is one that has been of slow development in this country. Most of that development has been made within the last twenty years. At the time the Republican party was granted a respite in governmental administration, and the Democratic party assumed control, following the election of 1892, there were only six beet-sugar factories in the United States. During the next four years one factory was discontinued. During that same period two new factories were established, and when the Democratic party was relieved of the responsibilities of governing, and the American people had declared their confidence in the Republican party by returning that party to power in 1896, there was only one more factory in the United States than at the time the Democratic party gained the ascendency, four years before.

The Republican party had seen the difficulties that had made doubtful the development of this industry. They had seen that capital was in danger of losing by reason of the strangeness of conditions. We did not know where the sugar beet would grow best. Our farmers did not know how to raise the crop. Machinery was new and imperfect. The by-products were undeveloped. Soil, climate, market, and a thousand other problems had to be met and overcome, and besides all this, one of the greatest trusts that the American people knew controlled the sugar output and threatened destruction to the new industry. The Republican party believed that that industry should receive encouragement. It believed that it should receive the same encouragement that had been given to other industries which had grown great. Accordingly, in the platform of 1896 a plank was placed reaffirming our faith in the policy of protection. Another plank was also inserted which declared our belief specifically in a policy which would build up the beet-sugar industry within our country. It read as follows:

We condemn the present Administration for not keeping faith with the sugar producers of this country. The Republican party favors such protection as will lead to the production on American soil of all the sugar which the American people use, and for which they pay other countries more than $100,000,000 annually.

Following out this promise that was made, we enacted in 1897 the Dingley tariff law, and in that law we gave adequate protection to the sugar industry.

But that is not all. That law was not placed on our statute books by chance. It was the result of thought. It was the result of care, and it was approved by the leaders of our party in that Congress. Mr. Dingley, who was chairman of the Ways and Means Committee at that time, and whose name attaches to the act, said in his discussion upon the floor of this House:

I believe that the time has come when the production of our own sugar from the beet ought to be and can be successfully entered upon, and thus the seventy-five millions—soon to be one hundred millions—sent abroad for the purchase of our sugar ultimately distributed here to our farmers.

The present chairman of the Ways and Means Committee [Mr. PAYNE], who stood next to Mr. Dingley on the committee when the bill was drafted, declared the wisdom of the act by saying:

We propose to raise beet sugar and cane sugar enough in this country to supply all our 73,000,000 people, who must have the best in the world, and in that way we will take off $50,000,000 in the course of a few years. * * * We will not disturb our tariff in the next quarter of a century.

The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR], then and now a member of the Ways and Means Committee, declared:

We propose that instead of sending $125,000,000 a year to the foreign countries of the world, most of which goes to pay labor in the production of sugar, we will make it possible for every pound of sugar that we want to be produced in the United States of America. [Applause.]

The Republican party comes and offers to the agriculturists of this country this magnificent boon. We will protect the industries of the country in all directions from further demoralization, and we ask you to turn aside hundreds of thousands of acres of the splendid lands of all these States from the production of corn, oats, wheat, potatoes, and cotton, to be put into an already overstocked market, to the production of sugar, and give to the farmers upon the farming lands of the country a better market with less competition than they now have.

And so I could continue. I could call to your attention the words of other of our leaders; but it is not necessary. I have shown to you what the beet-sugar industry had to rely upon in 1897, and, sirs, it had reason to be encouraged. Touched by the same hand that had brought life to a thousand industries and hope and courage and larger wages, too, to the toilers of our land in mill and mine and farm, the beet-sugar industry sprang forward with the same impetus that characterized the other industries protected by proper legislation. The year 1897 witnessed the building of two new factories, and during the years 1898, 1899, and 1900, twenty-seven new factories were established. This was a splendid record, and our party was proud of what had been accomplished. The laboring man had been benefited, the farmer had been rewarded, and the capital invested was making fair returns.

But that is not all. The Republican national platform of 1900 approved the work that had been done and affirmed its adherence to the policy of protection. Our public speakers did the same and pledged our party to the protection of our industries that stood in danger of foreign competition, and especially pledged our party to the protection of the manufacture of beet sugar. Our campaign text-book, which was approved and indeed authorized by the Republican national campaign committee, said, in discussing the need of the beet-sugar industry—

That [Porto Rican] duty was small, but it was an explicit declaration by the Republican party that it proposed to retain the power to fix such tariff as it might deem judicious against the products of cheap tropical labor wherever located and under whatever conditions. In other words, it was a distinct promise to the farmer that he need not fear that the Republican party would permit the cheap labor and cheap sugar of any tropical territory to be brought in in a manner which would destroy the infant industry of beet-sugar production which the farmers of the United States have under the fostering care of the Republican party been building up during the last few years.

Again, I say, the beet-sugar industry could feel encouraged. It was encouraged. The following three years witnessed great progress. Nineteen new factories were built, and as the year 1903 closed fifty-three factories were manufacturing sugar where seven factories had manufactured sugar in 1896. In 1903 we manufactured 208,135 tons of beet sugar as against less than 38,000 tons only seven years before. Not only that, but in 1903 our sugar factories paid to the farmers and laborers of our country employed in raising and handling sugar beets about $12,000,000.

DANGERS TO BEET-SUGAR INDUSTRY.

Now, for the dangers appearing above the horizon. Sugar is brought into our country free to-day from the Hawaiian Islands and from Porto Rico. Sugar is brought from Cuba by paying only 80 per cent of the Dingley rate. In fact, last year we imported from foreign countries under the full Dingley tariff only about 300,000 tons of sugar. The free or reduced rates granted to the islands I have already mentioned have worked a tremendous hardship upon the beet-sugar industry. Since 1903 two of the beet-sugar factories have been dismantled, three new factories have been erected, and now there are fifty-four factories, or one more only than there were in 1903. Do you ask me what has caused this change? My answer is the modification of the tariff, as mentioned before, in favor of Porto Rico, Cuba, and Hawaii and the proposed modification of the tariff as applied to the Philippine Islands.

In the laws already passed an injury has been done. Who, then, can measure the magnitude of the wrong that will follow the striking down of the duty on Philippine sugar to 25 per cent of the Dingley rate and in three more years the admission of their sugar free?

Do you know that prior to the passage of the Cuban bill the greatest annual production of sugar on that island, according to their own figures, was about 800,000 tons? The estimate of the Cuban Government for this year is 1,300,000 tons. Do you know that prior to the passage of the Porto Rican bill that island produced not to exceed about 66,000 tons of sugar in a single year? Last year it produced 116,000 tons. Do you know that prior to the annexation to our country of the Hawaiian Islands their annual output was not in excess of about 200,000 tons, and to-day it is 400,000 tons?

And what is the logical country to receive this sugar? Why, the United States, of course.

Is it any wonder, then, that the men who are interested in the manufacture of beet sugar are trembling to-day? Is it any wonder, then, that we have only one more factory to-day than we had in 1903? Who can measure the outcome of this industry should this pending bill become a law? And have not those who are interested in the raising of sugar beets and the manufacture of beet sugar reason to fear that the Republican party has forgotten its promises made so brief a time ago?

MENACE IN FREE PHILIPPINE SUGAR.

More than ten years ago the Philippine Islands produced 200,000 tons of sugar in a single year. This almost equals the sum total of our importation for last year under the Dingley rate.

True it is that war and pestilence have retarded the development of the sugar industry in the Philippine Islands during the last ten years, and yet, notwithstanding that, last year the islands shipped from their ports to foreign countries 112,500 tons of sugar. It does not require a stretch of the imagination to estimate the output of those islands equal to the present importation of sugar under the Dingley tariff. Aye, it does not demand that the imagination be called upon to estimate the output of the Philippines equal to, or even in excess of, our total importation from foreign countries.

The area of the islands is something like 73,000,000 acres, of which about ninety per cent will probably never be available for the highest agricultural purposes. If this is so, there remains about 7,000,000 acres of land, or, as others urge, 8,000,000 acres, that is highly valuable for that purpose. You see I am not indulging in extravagant figures. And even then all this land is not sugar land, as I admit. We are told, however, that not less than 1,500,000 acres is splendid land for the production of sugar. I believe that figure is conservative. Indeed, this much land can be found in the two provinces of Negros and Panay, the two leading sugar provinces of the islands. Experts believe that the land there is as good as any land the world possesses for the raising of sugar. Suppose, however, that this land produces only 1 ton of sugar per acre—and you see I am not appealing to your imaginations—you would then have over 1,500,000 tons of sugar, or as much as our total importation from foreign countries, including Cuba, which sends her sugar to our ports at 80 per cent of the Dingley rate.

But the land will produce more than 1 ton per acre. Mr. Welborn, the chief of the agricultural bureau in the Philippine Islands, reports that on the government farm, where better methods than the natives use are employed, the yield will be brought to 2¼ tons per acre. The governor of Negros Occidental reported in 1902 that an acre of land produces almost 2 tons of sugar, and this notwithstanding the fact that by reason of their imperfect machinery they sustain a loss of 45 per cent in the treatment of their cane. Mr. F. R. Hathaway, the secretary of the Michigan Sugar Manufacturers, told me that after careful examination in the island of Negros and the island of Panay that he estimated the loss sustained by reason of poor machinery in the handling of the cane as 40 per cent of its true value.

This is a difficulty that will pass away as the next few years go by. New machinery and new methods are already taking the place of the old. It is not unreasonable, then, that in a short time the Philippine Islands will be producing 3,000,000 tons of sugar every year, or an amount equal, approximately, to all that we consume.

Should this time come, I need not ask you what will become of the beet-sugar industry of the United States.

But this is not all. Sugar can be produced in the Philippine Islands at far less cost than it can be produced in our own land. Our laborers demand more here, and they deserve more. Our farm laborers here the country over, where sugar beets are raised, receive about $1.50 per day. The average farm laborer in the Philippine Islands receives probably not to exceed 17 cents per day and in many instances 8 or 10 cents.

The testimony relative to the cost of sugar in the Philippine Islands is so conflicting that it is hard to find a basis. Witnesses who claim to know say that it costs as much as from $1.40 to $1.75, and some even more, per hundred pounds to raise sugar in the islands of Negros and Panay and bring it to Iloilo ready for shipment. On the other hand, Mr. Hathaway, to whom I have referred before, declares that according to the testimony of all the sugar planters he consulted in an extensive tour of the island of Negros the average cost was 74½ cents per hundred pounds, and for the island of Panay an average cost of 73½ cents per hundred pounds. In both instances this included the delivery of the sugar to Iloilo, the sugar market of the archipelago. It costs 24 cents per hundred pounds to bring the sugar to New York Harbor, and this includes insurance. Of course, then, some allowance must be made in addition to this for the handling of the sugar, for the loading and the unloading.

Some allowance should also be made for interest on the capital invested and tied up during a long trip. The last two items would not exceed in the aggregate probably 2½ cents per 100 pounds. A fair average cost of production, then, would probably be $1.25 per hundred pounds in the islands. Add to this all the other costs and the sugar could be landed in New York City for less than $1.55 per hundredweight plus, for three years, a duty of 25 per cent. This, of course, is raw sugar. It would cost from 37½ to 62½ cents per hundred pounds for refining, and then the sugar would be ready for the market and would be used as a club to drive the beet-sugar industry from our land, for all the imported sugar is controlled in price by the great American sugar barons.

OUR DUTY TO AMERICAN LABORERS.

The beet-sugar companies can not produce sugar for less than about $4 per hundredweight. Three-fourths of this cost price goes to the farmer who raises the beets and to the laborers employed in handling the crop. Should this bill pass, the sugar trust could place the sugar from the Philippine Islands upon the American market for less than $3 per hundred pounds, and they would use that advantage in cost price to drive the beet-sugar industry from the American continent.

Sirs, this must come, or else the American farmer must be degraded, the American laborer must receive lower wages, and the American home be in want of that which our ideals demand.

Go if you please to the countries which have produced beet sugar for the longest time. The industry was born in France, and in its discovery the world owes a debt of gratitude to the great Napoleon for a service which must atone in part for the many wrongs he did. The industry was transplanted to Germany, and to-day those two countries have no industry that they cherish more. They have found it necessary to protect this industry with the care a father bestows upon a favored son. They not only protect it by sufficient tariff against the sugar from other lands but even from their own tropical possessions, where cane sugar can be produced. They levy a duty upon the sugar from these possessions that equals the difference in wages paid to low-grade labor and the wages paid to the laborers in the mother country.

If Germany and France find it necessary to protect their labor from the degraded labor of their insular possessions, surely America should hold up a higher standard for her workmen than is demanded by the degraded laborer of the Orient.

HOW THE INDUSTRY AFFECTS IDAHO.

And now, by way of illustration, let me speak of the industry as it concerns the State which I have the honor to represent in this body. The southern part of Idaho is arid and must be reclaimed by means of irrigation. Almost a million acres of our land to-day looks like the Valley of the Nile in her most fruitful season, yet yesterday it was a barren desert. A few more years and our acreage will be double what it is to-day.

Our land is rich. We can raise a thousand products, but that crop is best which brings the greatest returns to the farmers. We can raise alfalfa, but there is a limit to our consumption. We can raise grains, but you of the Middle West are at the door of a great market and our profit is consumed in freight. What we want now is a crop which will not alone be able to be handled, but will produce a market which will utilize our other crops. This the beet-sugar industry will furnish. We have to-day three factories representing a capital of about $3,000,000. These factories are larger than the average and each one has a slicing capacity of 1,000 tons of beets per day. To supply these beets requires a little more than 21,000 acres of land or about 7,000 acres for each factory. More than this, each factory paid to the farmers who raised the beets and the laborers employed upon the farms, an average of over $300,000 last year, or an aggregate of over $900,000 for the three factories.

This sum went to those who were engaged in producing the sugar beet, and yet they were not the only ones benefited. The people engaged in this industry in turn formed a market in part for the surplus products of other lands, while they produced a crop the essence of which was shipped at a rate similar to that charged for grains or other products. In this way an appreciable saving was made in freight charges to the farmers of this region. We want more factories, and that we may have them, we want the industry protected that will give them to us.

SUGAR TRUST ALONE BENEFITED.

We saw a little while ago that sugar can be produced cheaper in the Philippine Islands than it can be produced here. But who will receive the benefit of this reduction? The bill does not contemplate that the American consumer shall receive the benefit, but rather the producers in the Philippine Islands. Or even if it did contemplate that the benefit would be for us at home, the bill would fall short of its purpose because the price would be fixed by the sugar barons of the American sugar trust.

If the Philippine Islands did not produce enough, so that some sugar must still be brought from foreign countries, the foreign sugar would bear up the price, for it is a well-known principle of economics that the price of a commodity is not lower than its cost under greatest disadvantage. Again, if, as I fear, the Philippine Islands can produce so much sugar that we do not need to import a pound from foreign countries, but they can flood our markets, our beet-sugar industry will be ruined and American labor pushed several places down the line to a nearer level with the labor of the people across the seas.

PHILIPPINES NOT BENEFITED.

On the other hand, the Filipino will not receive the benefit. First of all, he will not because the American sugar trust will be his chief buyer. Second, he will not because, by reason of the terms of the Brussels convention, the principal countries of the world will refuse his sugar unless he pay a heavy duty. This will force him, then, to sell to us. I can not present this phase of the question better than by quoting from the American Economist of December 29, 1905. It reads as follows:

There is reason to think that free trade will result disadvantageously to the Philippine sugar producer in cutting him off from world markets and in forcing him to sell his product exclusively in the American market at a price to be fixed, not by the world market, from which he will be debarred, but by the American sugar trust. This aspect of the matter is well presented in a letter of December 11 to Hon. Charles E. Coffin, former Member of Congress from Maryland, written by Mr. F. R. Hathaway, secretary of the Michigan sugar manufacturers. In this letter Mr. Hathaway draws attention to the fact that the removal of the duty on Philippine sugar by the United States amounts to the payment of a bounty of 1¼ cents per pound, and that according to the terms of the agreement adopted by the Brussels sugar convention of September 1, 1903, the amount of this bounty will in all European markets be deducted from the price to be paid for Philippine sugar. On this point Mr. Hathaway says:

"Moreover, we believe that the proposed legislation will work to the detriment of the Philippine sugar industry. The Brussels conference was held in March, 1902. It resulted in the Brussels convention, which went into effect September 1, 1903. The signatory powers to the Brussels convention are all of the sugar-refining countries of Europe except Russia. The purpose of the convention was to terminate the system of bounties, direct and indirect, offered by European countries on the production of sugar. The terms of this convention provide that if any country shall offer after September 1, 1903, a bounty on the production of sugar, either directly or indirectly, either by the removal of a tariff or by any other means, that the powers signatory to the Brussels conference shall place upon sugar coming from such favored country a countervailing duty equivalent to the reduction made.

"England is one of the leading signatory powers to this convention. Hongkong belongs to England. The only Asiatic refineries, aside from two small ones in Japan, are located in Hongkong. The markets in which the Hongkong refiners sell their sugars are English, English India, French and German China. All of this territory is owned by powers signatory to the Brussels convention. From the leading English refiner in Hongkong I learned that if the proposed reduction of tariff on Philippine sugars entering the United States is enacted as a law he will be unable to use any Philippine raws unless he pays a countervailing duty equivalent to such reduction. He states this will virtually prohibit him from using any Philippine raws, and as the Filipino planter can not sell his sugar in continental Europe for a similar reason, the proposed legislation will virtually result in dumping the entire Philippine output into the United States. In point of fact, this refiner has not used any Philippine raws since the passage of our law reducing the tariff on Philippine sugars 25 per cent.

"Please note carefully the following way in which the Philippine planter will be handicapped: Suppose the world's price on raw sugar is 3¼ cents, and that our reduction in tariff is 1¼ cents. The countervailing duty on Philippine raws, if marketed anywhere other than the United States, will be 1¼ cents, which will make the net price to the Filipino planter 2¼ cents if he markets his sugars anywhere other than in the United States. When he brings his product to the United States he will find practically but one buyer for his goods, and this buyer knows full well that the planter can not get more than 2¼ cents for his sugars anywhere else than in the United States. If this buyer then offers the planter, say, 2¼ cents for his sugars he will surely get the output. Or, in other words, the Filipino planter will be obliged to take at least 1 cent a pound less for his sugars than he could obtain if he were allowed to market them, without the countervailing duty, in the world's markets.

"In view of the above statement it seems to me that the whole effect of the proposed legislation will be to turn the entire sugar business of the Philippines over to the sugar trust in the United States and leave the development of the sugar industry in those islands entirely at the mercy of that corporation. We fail to see how the proposed legislation can work to the benefit of anyone except the sugar trust."

DANGER OF CHINESE IMMIGRATION.

There is another objection that I see, to which I would call attention. It is well known that the labor of the Philippine Islands is a degraded labor. Many of the natives of the islands are splendid people. They have culture and attainments. They can take their places beside the people of enlightened countries. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LONGWORTH], who spoke a little while ago, paid a high compliment to one of them. He said: "Judge Arellano would adorn the bench of any court in the United States." I am glad of this. I want the time to come when they all shall be an enlightened race. At present their labor is degraded. Should the sugar industry assume the proportions that the conditions of the islands warrant, it would be necessary to import laborers from China to aid in handling the crop.

I hope this time may never come. I hope I may be wrong, and that even if this measure does become a law it will not be necessary to import the cooly labor from China to do our work, and especially when that work is in competition with our own labor. Yet there is grave reason to fear. The Hawaiian planters are already asking for this labor. The Philippine Commission expressed the same wish for the Philippine Islands in their report of November 1, 1902. Their recommendation was as follows:

That an amendment be made to the Chinese-exclusion act giving power to the Government by law to admit a fixed and limited number of Chinamen into the Philippine Islands, who are certified to be skilled laborers, on the bond of the employer that for every Chinese laborer employed he will employ a Filipino apprentice, and that he will return the Chinese skilled laborer thus introduced within five years after his admission into the country, and that he shall pay a head tax of not exceeding $50 for each Chinaman so admitted to the insular government, to be expended incident to the enforcement of these restrictions.

True it is there were limitations, but once the doors were open when would the difficulty end? Could it end in five years or in ten years, or would it be the beginning of a policy that would eventually bring cheap labor to the Pacific coast?

Governor Taft said, in testifying before the Philippine Committee (p. 173):

A franchise to an agricultural company—I know of a number—accompanied by the right to purchase something of the public domain, would bring a great deal of capital to the islands, if we can judge from the statements made to us by those who are interested.

Senator BURROWS. For what purpose?

Governor TAFT. For the raising of sugar, for the raising of rice, cocoanuts. I do not know that there is any proposition for the raising of hemp. There is for the raising of cotton and for the raising of tobacco.

Senator RAWLINS. In connection with your recommendation with respect to granting franchises and parting with lands in large tracts, say of 5,000 acres, which will be put in sugar, say——

Governor TAFT. To be correct, we have not recommended any particular number of acres. We think there ought to be the right to sell at public auction large quantities of land, and I think the bill fixes the limit at 2,500 acres.

Senator RAWLINS. That would make the condition similar to what it is in Hawaii, where companies, in order successfully to cultivate the land, would demand labor from China or some other source.

Governor TAFT. That is quite probable, for they are already demanding it.

Senator RAWLINS. They are already demanding it and exerting their influence to obtain it, and you know the fear among the people of the United States, especially in the West, where the beet-sugar industry is being developed.

Governor Luke E. Wright said, when he appeared before the Committee on the Philippines of the United States Senate, December 9, 1902:

The sugar industry, in my opinion, can not be very largely developed in the Philippine Islands. Of course it can be increased considerably, but it can not be made a rival to other countries which produce sugar on a large scale so long as the present policy of the United States is continued as to the exclusion of the Chinese cooly labor from that country. In other words, the native Filipino laborer is largely engaged in raising rice and food products aside from sugar and in gathering hemp and copra, and there is not a very great amount of labor there available for sugar raising on a large and profitable scale.

Senator BURROWS. Then do I understand that owing to labor conditions the development of the sugar industry would be retarded?

General WRIGHT. It would be slow.

Senator BURROWS. And it would be necessary to admit cheap labor—Chinese labor—in order to make it profitable?

General WRIGHT. Yes, sir.

Senator BURROWS. If that cheap labor were admitted, to what extent might that industry be developed?

General WRIGHT. Oh, indefinitely. The islands are very rich, and both climate and soil favor the production of sugar on a large scale. There is no doubt about that.

And so I say this is no idle question, and, sirs, I am opposed to any policy or any law which strikes a blow at the laboring people of our country. I am especially opposed to any policy which will bring the oriental labor into competition with our own. This does not come from a spirit of hatred or antipathy for a race. I want the Chinese people to succeed. They are succeeding. They have been touched by the hand of civilization and are being roused from their long slumber. But let success come to them on their own ground. Their blood is not our blood. Their ideals are not our ideals. In my judgment, the people of no nation should be given welcome to our shores in whom do not lie the essential elements of American citizenship.

DEVELOP NONCOMPETING INDUSTRIES.

And now one thought further and I am through. I believe in admitting free of duty every product that the islands can send forth that is not in competition with our own products. I believe in lending generous encouragement in the development of such industries. Let me give an illustration. My home is in the center of a great grain belt. Northern Idaho and eastern Washington send to the markets of the world about 60,000,000 bushels of grain every year. Much of this grain goes to foreign countries. It must be put in sacks. Last year the sacks for our grain cost us about $1,000,000. We have this expense to meet every year. It is an enormous tax. Hemp grows wild in the Philippine Islands, and we are informed by testimony before the Philippine Commission that it can be placed upon our markets at one-third our present prices should the industry be developed. This would mean a saving to the farmers of my section of over half a million dollars every year. Besides this it would help the Filipino. And so we could continue. We could develop the coffee industry. Coffee grows on nearly every island in the Philippine Archipelago and would not compete with industries at home. Last year we imported into this country more than $80,000,000 worth of coffee.

Why not let the Filipino share largely in the benefit of this great trade? We need the copra, the cocoanuts, the cocoa, the rice that he wants to sell. We need the products of his forests. We need the fruits of a thousand industries that could be developed there.

On the other hand, he needs that which we produce. He needs our grains, He needs our machinery. He needs our wealth in the delving of his mines, the building of his railroads, the development of his industries. More than that, and for which money can not pay, he needs our encouragement and our good will. We have established schools. We have made clean his cities. We are teaching him the lesson of self-government.

We have a duty there, but our duty does not lie in exploiting the islands at the expense of American citizenship and American labor. [Applause.]

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Chairman, I do not know of any other gentleman who desires to take the floor to-night. If not, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. OLMSTED, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill H. R. 3—the Philippine tariff bill—and had come to no resolution thereon.

Mr. PAYNE. I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly, and in compliance with the order heretofore entered, the House (at 4 o'clock and 58 minutes p. m.) adjourned until to-morrow, Saturday, January 13, 1906, at 11 o'clock a. m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

SATURDAY, January 13, 1906.

The House met at 11 o'clock a. m.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. HENRY N. COUDEN, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

PHILIPPINE TARIFF.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 3—the Philippine tariff bill.

The motion was agreed to; and accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 3—the Philippine tariff bill—Mr. OLMSTED in the chair.

[Mr. GAINES of Tennessee addressed the committee. See Appendix.]

Mr. WILEY of Alabama. Mr. Chairman, I am in favor of the bill under consideration. Its provisions do not go far enough, in my humble judgment, to bring all the relief needed, but the measure unquestionably is a step in the right direction. I concur in the views of the members of the great Committee on Ways and Means, as contained in the minority report, and I am decidedly of the opinion that if we are to hold the Philippine Islands as a part of our trans-Pacific territory we should deal with the inhabitants in a spirit of justice and fairness, and when we do that it means nothing short of the establishment of absolute free-trade relations between the two countries.

There was a volume of truth in Gen. Winfield Scott Hancock's definition of the tariff. He declared it to be a local question—that is to say, when one community, within certain limitations, finds it profitable to protect by special legislation a particular interest affecting that locality, the influences coming from that quarter will line up unerringly on the side of a tariff wall, erected for "the sake of protection," and vice versa. In advocating the passage of this bill I do not pretend to be free from selfish or sectional motives, but, notwithstanding my environments, my patriotism takes a wider range than mere partisan considerations. The opening of the "door of opportunity" in the Orient to the southern planter, spinner, and manufacturer, as well as to the wide-awake and progressive business man in the East and West, will undoubtedly result in higher prices for our cotton, wool, shoes, leather, hides, iron, cloths, coal, wood, and other commodities used in the Tropics, without materially injuring any American interest, such as sugar, coffee, tobacco, or rice. That no country can be prosperous without markets for the disposition of its products is so undeniably true as to be axiomatic—a self-evident proposition.

As a member of the Taft party, who went to the Far East last summer, I learned on that itineracy some things I did not know before, and I hope the House will pardon me for imparting some of the knowledge I thus acquired as to the history, conditions, prospects, and capabilities of the Philippine Islands as a necessary preliminary to an intelligent discussion of the subject of providing revenue, even temporarily, for them.

The Philippines are a group of islands in the Torrid Zone, discovered by Hernando Magellan in 1521, and occupied and colonized by Spain in the same century. They vary in number from 1,000 to 3,300, according to the size of the rock that may happen to be dignified with the title "island." The twelve largest, in the order named as to size, are Luzon, Mindanao, Samar, Panay, Mindoro, Palawan (Paragua), Leyte, Negros, Cebu, Masbate, Bohol, and Catanduanes, containing in the aggregate a population of more than 7,000,000 souls and possessing about 73,000,000 acres of land, a large part of which is both fertile and tillable. Situated within 350 miles of the equator, the climate is hot, but on account of constant sea breezes a mean temperature is produced, rendering it both salubrious and healthy.

There are eight principal tribes, to wit, Bicol, Cagayán, Ilocano, Pampangan, Pagasinan, Tagalog, Viscayan, and Zambalan. There are 61,000,000 acres of public domain, of which 40,000,000 are dense with forests of finest and most durable of hard woods, and contain rich mines of silver and gold and copper, with evidences of abundant coal and iron awaiting development. The chief products are hemp, tobacco, sugar, copra, rubber, indigo, gutta-percha, lumber, coffee, and cacao. Fruits are never cultivated there, but the banana, lemon, lime, chico, citron, mango, orange, lausaner, pomelo, mangostine, and other edible varieties, which are generally indigenous to tropical soil, grow wildly and profusely in that sunny climate and are both palatable and nutritious.

The census, taken in 1903 by conservative enumerators, reveals not only a gratifying condition as to the intelligence of a large percentage of the inhabitants, but surprising information as to the magnitude of these possessions and the possibility of developing them.

The islands lend themselves most favorably to water transportation. Good harbors now are well-nigh numberless, while there are 450 miles of navigable streams flowing either into the Sea of China or the Pacific Ocean. Many other rivers could readily be rendered navigable by opening their mouths. For this purpose it would require only a small outlay to remove all impeding bars.

The first and most commendable work of the Spaniards after settling these oriental lands was to Christianize the various tribes, with the exception of those of Mindanao and a few other bands of "wild men," who, like the North American Indian, retreated to their mountain fastnesses before the march of a civilization that shed a radiant influence of peace and good will all around them at that period of Spanish history.

All indications point to the conclusion that catttle raising will become a profitable industry. The large areas of growing pastures are particularly suitable for ranches. Now that the rinderpest insect has been practically stamped out it is manifest that horses, mules, oxen, bulls, and carabaos will thrive there.

The Spanish Crown organized originally at Manila a strong central government, inaugurated industrial enterprises, opened ports to foreign trade, encouraged commerce, and enacted just laws. Considerable progress was speedily made toward material prosperity and national exaltation; but when the world moved out of ancient mediævalism, leaving Spain in its enervating and corrupt embrace, her brilliant power began to decay and the glory of her name and fame to wane forever. The champions of ecclesiasticism cemented the union of monarchy with church.

The inquisition placed its burning seal upon the lip, tortured the body, shackled the limb, and threw its black shadow over the soul's recesses of the hapless victim of despotic power. Feudalism was adopted; the people no longer had a voice in the affairs of government. They were vassalized. Churchmen profoundly influenced the policy and fate of the nation. Foreign priests and exploiting soldiers were placed in absolute control and guided the ship both of church and state. It developed that many of the friars were not God-serving nor God-fearing men. Under these surroundings it is not to be marveled at that the laws on all hands were shamelessly disregarded and the whole country was manipulated for the aggrandizement of certain selfish foreign-born priests and the enrichment of Spanish officeholders. Commercial and trade relations were devised only to add wealth to the Spanish Peninsula. In the course of time it is said the reprehensible conduct of some of these alien friars became so offensive to the common people that they not only fell off in their religious zeal and devotion, but did not hesitate, in many instances, to apply the torch to valuable church property. It is admitted there by worthy members of the Catholic denomination that some of those priests were graceless men, who despoiled the people, and, on this account, were largely responsible for the hatred which was everywhere engendered against the Kingdom of Spain. Do not misunderstand me. I am not speaking against Catholicism, but against a certain wicked foreign class, who having fattened themselves in "the fleshpots of Egypt" put on the "livery of heaven to serve the devil in." They were far from the wholesome restraints of the Vatican and mother land. Hence a tale of woe; but there never was any general complaint against the native priests. The dislike was to the alien. Corruption in public station was the rule; honesty the exception. Graft was systematized. Cheating grew grandiloquent and styled itself policy. Money, whenever voted for internal improvements, was stolen by fat and pampered officials to whom it was intrusted. It was appropriated but not distributed. This distressing condition of affairs did not improve with time. For instance, in the year 1863 there occurred a disastrous earthquake, and $400,000 was subscribed as a relief fund. Not one cent of this contribution ever found its way to the sufferers.

Education was almost entirely neglected, although a law on the statute books made it mandatory to teach Spanish in the schools; but the local authorities, both temporal and spiritual, refused to allow such instruction. Their policy was to keep the masses in ignorance and by grinding the face of the poor to prevent the growth of anything like national unity through a common language. The result was, in the island of Luzon alone, as late as 1900, there were twenty different dialects and not less than seventy tongues spoken throughout the archipelago. The various tribes not only could not speak Spanish, but could not talk to each other. "Liberty regulated by law" was not dreamed of. In the execution of law, either civil or criminal, there was not any semblance of justice. Filthy lucre decided every legal issue. Men were thrown into frowning bastiles without charge or formal accusation. They had scarcely any right to face their prosecutors, to confront those who testified against them, nor to have process to compel the attendance of their own witnesses. A trial under such circumstances was a mockery. During the few years immediately preceding the last Filipino insurrection in 1896–1898, executions of criminals, including political prisoners, were daily spectacles on the Luneta. Beautiful court ladies, robed in gay but richest apparel, full of mirth and joy, laughing at human suffering, reclining luxuriously in handsome carriages driven by cocheros dressed in royal livery, were conveyed every afternoon to the slaughter wall to witness the shooting or garroting of some unfortunate native, like the gifted José Rizal, the immortal patriot, unjustly condemned to death for opinion's sake and because he loved the land of his birth.

The ignorance of business methods was lamentable. The rich and powerful were virtually exempt from taxation. The laws of economy were ignored. The burden of raising all revenue rested heavily and exclusively upon the shoulders of the poor. Taxes were laid on the necessities of life. None were imposed on luxuries, which the tao (common man) was never permitted to enjoy. No improvement in agricultural implements was even suggested. No progress in mechanical arts was shown. The most primitive means of cultivating the earth and in carrying on works of construction prevailed. Compulsory labor was exacted, and peonage existed in an atrocious form. Spaniards like Weyler took pains to extort all the money they needed to take back to Madrid, but cared not to leave bettered conditions behind them. Crude methods of raising and handling crops still exist; but good husbandry and skilled machinery, if proper labor could be obtained, would yield harvests well-nigh as rich and abundant as those now grown by our most intelligent and successful American farmers.

The lack of educational facilities to these benighted islanders, during the long and dismal period of the cruel Spanish reign, was deliberately planned. It was outrageous. A ruthless oligarchy, with refined subtlety, was thus enabled to generate credulity and engender superstition on the part of an ignorant people. Even now, by simply playing upon their sense of awe and veneration, it is easy to dominate them. For example, it was related to me by a reliable gentleman, while I was in Manila last summer, that a certain knavish chieftain, staggering under a load of poverty, made a fortune by using a megaphone. Through it he announced from a hill overlooking a town in one of the provinces that he was God Almighty, and that it was his divine command that the natives should bring to him, without delay, all the good things they possessed in the shape of money, goods, flax, cloth, arms, bolos, fruits, rice, potatoes, vegetables, grain, etc.

These ignorant dupes, so easily victimized, shrouded in religious mystery, cheerfully and with alacrity obeyed this unprincipled imposter. This explains the fact that among the ladrones, who in recent years have been hung at Manila for highway robberies and murders, there have been found six Jesus Christs, four Popes of Rome, and several Thomas Jeffersons and George Washingtons. These illustrious names were assumed by outlaws to enable them to inspire the blind confidence of these simple-minded men-children of the Far East.

In the annals in which are recorded the lasting events of the world's history there never has been chronicled a worse government than that which Spain swayed over the islands at the time Dewey's guns in Manila Bay thundered the downfall of her merciless thraldom over these possessions.

Such were the conditions existing there when the treaty of Paris was ratified by the United States Senate. It imposed numerous and momentous obligations upon our great Republic touching the control and dominion of the Philippines and the betterment of the Filipinos. These altruistic responsibilities and duties we can not now evade, even if we desired to do so. "Benevolent assimilation" is the term William McKinley used in defining our policy in this connection. The difficult problem is squarely before us; we have bravely undertaken to try the experiment; yet we can not shut our eyes to the conspicuous fact that, for the most part, these uneducated islanders are ignorant of both the science and art of self-government. That circumstance, however, is not surprising, because they never had a chance to learn the lesson.

Now, after the peace treaty had been ratified, and when the Administration at Washington was preparing to give attention to the moral, social, and civil rights of this people, as well as protection and encouragement to every business interest in the archipelago, certain red-mouthed political agitators, like Aguinaldo, Lopéz, Luna, and others, with no loftier notions of liberty than those which have always prevailed in Central American states, believing that revolution would pay them better dividends than legitimate business vocations, began at once to prate loudly about independence, with the result that they drenched their country in blood. By their peculiar "tricks of trade" they found it not difficult to play upon the fanaticism and racial prejudices of the common masses to such an extent as to foment an insurrection against the sovereign authority of the United States, the most powerful nation on the globe. The perfidious Aguinaldo had already gotten his price, aggregating about $400,000, from Spain, at different times, to put down revolts which he himself had started, and he vainly hoped by similar treachery to again enrich himself by setting on foot a corresponding hostile movement against the supremacy of our American Republic.

These leaders mistook our moderation and courtesy for cowardice, and so taught their deluded followers. The whole country was quickly stirred from shore to shore by silly braggadocio, and the bombastic talk of irresponsible, political montebanks, and erstwhile bandits. Not being ready, at that very moment of time, for an extended campaign, the military commander of the army of occupation, under the advice of President McKinley, issued a proclamation of amnesty, promising pardon to all who would lay down their arms; but a persistent belief in the craven qualities of our soldiers so inflamed the passions of the insurgents as to rush them headlong to their doom. They flocked to Manila by thousands, each man carrying a sack, with which to take away his proportionate share of booty when the city should be looted.

These fanatics went into battle believing they were invul-nerable to American bullets. In order to account for the large numbers who fell in these ouslaughts, they invented a fiction to the effect that their fallen braves were only feigning death and that in a short while they would again appear in the flesh as valiant soldiers, armed from head to foot, in order thereby the better to fight the war of extermination to "the foreign devils." With 80,000 men, rank and file, who were finally put in the field by authority of the United States Congress, the insurrection was crushed and ended within a period of two years, but not until the knightly Lawton was killed at San Mateo and many a brave lad had gone to an untimely grave; not until the only railroad in Luzon had been destroyed; not until numerous churches, temples, monasteries, convents, palaces, schoolhouses, and municipal edifices had been burned, and not until hundreds of the best towns—like Iloilo and Albay—in several rich provinces had been wiped out of existence by barbarian bands. This havoc was wrought under the insane idea that they were doing the sensible thing to repel invasion, as the Russians did at Moscow. They never thought of the differing climatic conditions. The Russians burned houses in the dead of winter and in snowstorms in order to "freeze out" Napoleon and his conquering army, and they accomplished thereby the end aimed at. The Filipinos, having applied the torch everywhere in the confident hope of driving out our soldiers, were astonished to find that they could sleep in tents or on the ground in the open air without shelter and under tropical skies. With fire leading their army, famine and desolation followed in their train. That beautiful country was left in sackcloth and ashes. With their own hands they had struck the blow.

I pause in my remarks long enough to solemnly declare that our soldiers, both officers and privates, under most trying circumstances, manifested extraordinary clemency, forbearance, and moderation. Under the flag they did their duty with patience, courage, and humanity. They were villified and abused by persons, either misinformed or malicious, for alleged acts of injustice and oppression never perpetrated by them; for the destruction of property, of which they were guiltless; for the burning of homes to which the Filipinos themselves set fire. All honor to the brave men who unflinchingly upheld the faith, credit, and glory of their country in the face of calumny and unmerited detraction!

These were some of the difficulties which confronted and beset Governor-General Taft and his colaborers and associates when they went there to establish a civil government five years ago. They found no wharves, no telegraph lines, no commerce. Trade was paralyzed, industry was at a standstill, fields had gone out of cultivation, and sanitary conditions were horrid. Pestilence stalked abroad in the land. Smallpox, Asiatic cholera, and bubonic plague ravaged town and village, hillside and valley alike, and did not pause until they had swept off a half million inhabitants. The terrible disease called "rinderpest" afflicted the draft animals, almost annihilating all the horses, mules, oxen, bulls, and carabaos (water buffalo) in what then seemed a drought-cursed land, while swarms of locusts ate up the growing crops. Egypt in the days of the Pharaohs was never worse stricken.

This picture is not overdrawn. But a wondrous change has come over the land and over the hopes and aspirations of the people. The Americans, having ended the insurrection, proceeded at once to bring about peace and order, to enforce the law, and let justice hold an evenly balanced scale. They were quick to give local self-government to the municipalities, where the people now elect their own town presidents and councilmen and manage their own affairs in their own way, under the supervision, of course, of the central insular government at Manila.

Local governments are also in operation in each province, composed of two Americans and one native; but the native, as a general rule, is the governor, elected to office by the suffrages of the people. This is what was originally known as the administration of the pueblo, or township, which embraced many square miles of country and contained numerous "barrios," and afterwards, because of its potentiality, was changed to province. These provincial capitals are admirably located, and in the center of each stands, without exception, not only a great church and a convent of missionary friars, but are also the market places and trading shops of Chinese, as well as the elegant homes of the prosperous Filipinos.

The central insular government at Manila has both legislative and executive functions. It consists of eight members, appointed by the President of the United States, five of whom are Americans and three are Filipinos.

The United States troops in all the islands, both officers and men, number at this time only about 13,000 and seem amply able to preserve peace and promote the public weal.

The insular government, as before mentioned, is nonpartisan. With Gen. Luke E. Wright, a southern Democrat, at the head, they have provided 3,000 schools and imported over 1,000 American teachers, who are so industriously and efficiently teaching the English language that after six years of occupation it is discovered that there are now more persons there speaking our tongue than ever spoke Spanish at any given time in the history of the archipelago. In the higher schools are taught all the general branches of nautical, mathematical, mechanical, telegraphical, medical, and scientific knowledge.

In addition to this good work the constituted authorities at Manila have codified the laws, done away with compulsory labor, cleaned up all the cities, stamped out disease, exterminated cholera, and put in a first-class quarantine system. They have introduced by inoculation a method of protection against the rinderpest plague, which, as already stated, a few years ago killed 80 per cent of the draft animals throughout the islands; and by means of compulsory vaccination they have enormously decreased the ravages of smallpox. This beneficent result cost the insular government $650,000. They have also put into effect a customs system which, with the revenue laws now in force, provides a sufficient fund for the operation of the whole machinery of civil government. Taxes have been equalized. The burden has been shifted from the poor man and distributed with something like equality amongst the classes. Under a lower rate than the Spaniards fixed they gather yearly ₱30,000,000, as against ₱13,000,000 formerly collected by the Crown officials. They have set in motion the wheels of civil government in every province, which includes the establishment of all necessary tribunals where even-handed justice—"the one weight and the one measure"—is dispensed without let or hindrance, without delay, barter, or favor; and where habeas corpus, the great writ of liberty wrested by the barons of England from King John at the battle of Runnymede, is within the easy reach of every citizen.

One of the great drawbacks to commerce, both interisland and foreign, has been the lack of dock facilities. I am informed that the insular government has been compelled to spend about $5,000,000 in dredging canals and improving harbors among these islands, for the protection of sea-going ships against typhoons, monsoons, and trade winds, and in promoting commerce, notably at Manila, Iloilo, Cebu, and Jolo.

They have inaugurated a system of coast surveys which will eventuate in obtaining an accurate chart of 11,000 miles of sea frontage, which is double the coastage of the United States, excluding Alaska.

They have connected by telegraph and cable the capital city of Manila with every outlying province, and are maintaining 450 post-offices, affording good postal service to all. In the meanwhile they have not neglected to take an accurate census of the islands at a cost approximating $700,000.

They have expended about $2,000,000 in building turnpikes and public roads, including the great highway to Baguio; laid out and beautified several parks and pleasure grounds; constructed ice plants, and erected many new light-houses, increasing the number from 15 to 85, to say nothing of needed buoys in all the straits and bays, thereby rendering navigation there perfectly safe.

They have a fleet of coast-guard vessels for interisland service, amounting to 20 steamers, carrying rapid-fire guns, which aid greatly in giving police protection to all the provinces.

They have established a leper colony, where 10,000 of these outcasts can be segregated and cared for. They have recently passed a land-registration act, which will clear the title to property on which the majority of the people reside, giving them sufficient quantities for agricultural and business pursuits, fixing well-defined boundary lines between owners of the fee and "squatters," as well as between municipalities and "barrios" or "sitios," which mean rural villages or settlements. They have at last purchased the lands belonging to or claimed by the religious orders, thus settling amicably and satisfactorily a vexing and irritating subject—"the apple of discord." The wise and consecrated prelate, Archbishop Harty, a native of St. Louis, Mo., "the right man in the right place," is arranging, so rumor has it, to dispense with the services of 80 per cent of the friars, who have proven objectionable to the masses, and will have them go away at an early day, never to return. Of course, other priests, known to be good and worthy, will be substituted in their stead, and this is commendable.

The necessity for railroads connecting the rich agricultural regions with the principal seaports is apparent to every intelligent observer. A plan is on foot, therefore, to increase the railway mileage there by the immediate construction of an additional 1,000 miles of railroad. This facility is greatly needed. It will not only roll on the car of progress and civilization, but will multiply manifold the prosperity of these insular possessions.

The Commissioners have re-created Manila, making her, in five years' time, the most beautiful city in the Orient. The things done, the results accomplished, are monuments to their fidelity, energy, partiotism, and capacity. In the disbursement of public funds I do not believe any taint of dishonesty has attached to any civilian official who has been commissioned by the President to administer the affairs of government out yonder in the Far East. The record thus made speaks for itself. It is both gratifying and creditable.

I observe from the newspapers that in an address delivered recently at Manila, Col. William Jennings Bryan, twice the Democratic candidate for the Presidency, said:

The officials of the Philippines are representative Americans and have the best interests of the natives and islands at heart.

This is a valuable indorsement.

I believe, too, that Manila, romantically situated on the banks of the Pasig River, will again become the most important emporium of a vast antipodal empire—a proud mistress commanding the opulent trade of a billion people, embraced in all those coveted lands and seas, which for four centuries has been the burning desire of every European state.

I am sure she will yet be the mighty entrepôt through which the kingdoms of Asia and Africa will exchange their wealth of useful wares. I could fill pages in the enumeration of the various merchandise which in the near future, as my judgment sees it, will be bought and sold, bartered, and pledged, according to all the protean forms in which business contracts are framed in this magnificent mart, but instead I will content myself by only naming a few of these articles, viz: Embroidered silks, brilliant brocades, oriental cloths, richest tapestry, and beautiful rugs and carpets; hemp, flax, mats, hats, pearls, jewels, gems, corals, and variegated jewelry; gold, silver, precious stones, and objects of the most artistic handiwork; rice, breadstuffs, coffee, sugar, tobacco, and cacao; fruits, nuts, and light wines; spices, citrons, lemons, limes, cinnamon, ginger, and pepper; camphor, indigo, rubber, and every kind of hardwood; curious and most durable weapons, of keenest blade and cunning workmanship, and finest hand-carved furniture; honey, wax, incense, and myrrh; sago, pottery, glass, beads, and every variety of earthenware, to say nothing of the rare and costly productions from Bengal, India, Persia, Mesopotamia, and Turkey. It would be a shortsighted policy to put any limitations upon her commercial growth and development. Her expansion along these natural trade lines means that our ocean-going steamships, laden with enormous riches and valuable products from these oriental lands and seas, will ultimately be poured into the laps of our adventurous and enterprising American merchants.

Surely this is a matter worthy of thoughtful, patriotic, nonpartisan consideration. In passing, and before I reach the economic question involved in the bill under consideration, permit me to say it is difficult to convince our southern farmers that they have not already been greatly benefited by the retention of these "colonial" possessions in the light of the interesting fact that cotton in late years steadily advanced from 5 cents to 16½ cents per pound, and as a consequence great prosperity has come to our section.

The Filipinos are being taught the important lesson that the essence of good government is self-reliance; that the masses must "learn to labor and to wait;" must have high ideals and live up to them; must recognize and respect the individual rights of man, and must know how to bear responsibility. All this is necessary to become a self-governing race; and until they learn these simple yet essential principles it is worse than folly to preach about independence to them or for them. As has been wisely said, "Ideal life for men is found only in governed society, where there is order and protection, and where also should be feedom of opportunity." The tao (the common man) must be westernized, modernized. His political training will have to be unlearned. He must be taught just ideas of liberty, equality, fraternity, and democracy. It remains to be seen whether a durable government can be built out there on these doctrines, and whether society can be reformed under such benign influence.

I learned while there that wages and labor are burning questions. I have neither the time nor inclination to discuss these issues, but suffice it to say that, in my humble opinion, great possibilities are stretched out before these people under western tutelage, with immense resulting advantages to us, the people of the United States. From a material point of view our efforts are bound to result in reciprocal profit.

The "Moses's wand" of intelligent labor (whenever the same can be had) and well-directed pursuit can not fail to increase the general weal to such an extent as to make those broad acres the most productive and prosperous in the Tropics. By affording us larger and better markets for the surplus products of our woods, fields, shops, dairies, and manufactories there can be no question that we will be able to secure the "lion's share" of this oriental trade. Dewey's guns and the Paris treaty put these islands under the sovereignty of our great Republic. By purchase and the law of conquest they came under our flag. Public opinion and the conscience of mankind approved our action and applauded our purposes. We made no conquest to exploit our colonial fellow-citizen, and his welfare demands that he be protected from foreign and domestic plunder and official greed. As a stronger nation we are bound to assist a weaker one, even without assurance of material reward; and this undertaking by our brave and generous race is worthy of the profoundest interest and consideration.

In this connection, I do not know of any better way of outlining our American policy in reference to these insular possessions than to quote the following words from the eloquent speech of Congressman BOURKE COCKRAN last August, in Manila, at the archbishop's banquet. No tongue of mine can sketch that policy as graphically and accurately as he has done. He said:

The subject assigned me is a discussion of the Philippines in general. It is a wide subject. It embraces their history, their conditions, their capacities, their prospects. Their history, I take it, is familiar to you all. To assume to summarize it here would be presumption. Their actual condition is as obvious to you as to me. An attempt to call attention to them would be superfluous. Their history is still shrouded behind the mists that conceal the future. To undertake to describe it would be to assume the power of prophecy, and I have no pretensions to that quality. While we may not see what that future may be, certain it is that the most powerful influence in determining its character is the Government of the United States. Whatever may be God's purpose in these islands, the United States are the instruments here, as the Secretary of War has described more than once, under circumstances quite unique in the history of the world. For the first time in the experience of mankind, a country has been annexed by another government not for its own benefit but for the benefit of the country that it has annexed; not to enrich itself, but to benefit the people it has taken over. The history of the world may be searched for a parallel to this. I think we may survey the whole aspect of civilization without finding anything to correspond to it. The object of this conquest is the uplifting, the benefiting, the ultimate emancipation of the islands. We do not take them even to hold them; we do not undertake to improve them to make the holding of them easier for ourselves or more profitable. But we undertake to improve and uplift them that they themselves may ultimately be competent to go upon a career of prosperity and independence.

CHINA.

China occupies one-tenth of the world's territory, and contains one-fifth of the world's population, to wit, 500,000,000 people. To all the leading nations, therefore, the Celestial Empire has come to be a country of intense commercial concern.

As the bulk of all our cotton goes to Asia the agricultural interests of the South in the matter of the establishment of eastern markets are vital and special.

China is an incomprehensible country. The mystery of her people and the enigmas of her Government are such as to cause one to go astray when trying to state the plainest Chinese facts. Four thousand years old, she seems to me to be dying of age and senile decay. Manifestly, her vitality is running low. For the past century she has been slowly ossifying—this country that gave letters and learning, the arts and sciences, the printing press, philosophy, language and advanced civilization to the oriental world; this country whose self-restraint, self-reliance, and individual contentment have formed the basis of every religious creed on the globe. She saw Persia, Macedonia, Babylonia, Assyria, Egypt, Greece, and Rome rise and fall. She watched their reconstruction, regeneration, and subsequent downfall. She saw them a second time break and again go to pieces. For these long ages she has endured.

To-day the aggressive world powers are anxiously gazing upon her last symptoms, her coming dissolution and extinction. The Chinese remain always the same incomprehensible, homogeneous, unfathomable, unchanging, unchangeable, unassimilating, and inscrutable people, no matter under what sky they toil or in what clime they live—always idolatrously loyal to the decayed and crumbling old Empire. As a class they are the most logical and illogical, the steadiest and most varying, the frankest and most secretive, the firmest and most vascillating, the most learned, and yet the most ignorant; in short, the most contradictory creatures on the surface of the earth. Of all the orientals no race is so alien. There is no kinship or common feeling possible between the Anglo-Saxon and Chinese. They are lacking in soul, charm, and magnetism. Their vast numbers and eternal sameness—the monotonous resemblance of one individual to 500,000,000 others, all having the same physical and mental mold, the same yellow skin, almond-shaped eyes, and high metallic voice, the same manners and dress, the same superstitions and prejudices, the same selfish conservatism and blind worship of antiquity, do not fall far short of something appalling. China has rightly been called "The Empire of the great unwashed;" but in business affairs the Chinese are enterprising, energetic, thrifty, and absolutely honest.

The Hongkong and Shanghai banking corporation managers put the Celestials at the very top of those who are trustworthy. In Shanghai banks the Chinese business done in the past thirty years has amounted, approximately, to $2,000,000,000; and there has never been a defalcation. Not a single Chinaman has ever failed to meet every term and stipulation of his contract. To be dishonest is the worst disgrace that can overwhelm a Chinaman. It means for him the everlasting disapproval of his ancestors, disbarment from heaven, a lost spirit condemned to fly forever from star to star, from planet to planet, throughout the countless ages of eternity.

There has never been but one bank failure in China, and everybody connected with the institution, either directly or remotely, had his head cut off and rolled into a basket. In this respect she has set a most laudable example to the Christian people of this country.

They are so reliable that the Japanese employ them in money matters in preference to natives. Whenever a person has occasion to call at a counting house, a manufacturing establishment, a bank, a store, or hotel in Kobe, Yokohama, Nagasaki, Tokyo, Osaka, Kyoto, or any other large city in Japan, he will observe that the man who handles the cash, whether called cashier, paying teller, treasurer, accountant, or whatnot, is a long-queued Celestial in flowing robes. This is because in financial affairs the Chinaman is honest. He has before him his wooden beads on a string of wire and with them he can run up a column of figures with lightning rapidity and unerring accuracy. The Chinaman fears to "lose his face"—that is to say, his credit.

Hongkong and Shanghai are England's great manufacturing marts in the Eastern world.

HONGKONG.

The proper name for the city is Victoria, but everybody now calls it Hongkong, after the island of that name. The island is 13 miles long and 3 miles wide, containing a population of 500,000, and is one of England's most valuable possessions. The city proper has a population of 300,000, and is, perhaps, the best built metropolis of its size in the world. Most of the houses are of granite. It is constructed on the side of a mountain 2,000 feet high. The residential part is lovely beyond compare. Babylon, with her famous hanging gardens, was never as radiantly beautiful as Hongkong. It is a city of palaces. Three regiments are stationed there. The Highlanders, Fusiliers, and Sepoys are constantly deploying through the Queen's road, and with all the brown and yellow races of Asia streaming through the arcades, Hongkong is so spectacular, picturesque, and dramatic that no one ever tires of watching its fast-moving panoramas.

SHANGHAI.

Shanghai has a foreign import and export trade of £40,000,000 sterling. Half the foreign trade of China goes up and down the Woo-Sung River. Great fortunes have been made there. The foreign population of new Shanghai numbers about 8,000, chiefly British and American citizens. It is one of the most beautiful and best governed cities in the world—the greatest surprise of the East. Situated near the Yangtze River, its banks are covered with miles of graves, and are thick with shipyards, cotton mills, and other manufacturing establishments. The hum, roar, and bustle of modern industries oppress the air. One can scarcely credit the fact that this hustling, feverishly busy city is in Asia. Society is brilliant, extravagant, fascinating, keyed up to the highest pitch and tone of the great social centers of the western world. But what a contrast between new and old Shanghai, the latter being a city of a million and a half people, where one smells the true flavor of China, the heavy sickening odor of bean oil, of incense and opium smoke, of filthy human bodies pervading the atmosphere, and beholds narrow streets, toy houses, and all uncleanliness.

In these two great English cities our raw materials are manufactured into finished goods, and the British Empire is thus enabled to monopolize the oriental markets. These are facts we ought not to overlook in the discussion of a Philippine tariff.

JAPAN.

Old Japan is passing away. New Japan has emerged from her chrysalis. She has stepped forth from a place of exclusiveness and timidity into the front ranks of the great powers, henceforth to be the dominant and guiding influence in shaping the destinies of Asia, in galvanizing into life the effete civilization of the ancient peoples of the Orient.

We have discovered that Perry's Christian opening of Japanese ports has not given us any mortgage on the Mikado's commerce. As the industries grow that country will become a great manufacturing center.

Indeed, Japan has already become a mighty factor in the Orient as the manufacturer of cloth, shoes, and machinery. Only about 13 per cent of her soil is tillable. The balance is sterile, barren, unproductive, abandoned volcanic formations. As a consequence, the masses, who are gifted in handicraft and are generally skillful as artists, whenever a chance is offered to them, are glad to engage in manufacturing and mechanical enterprises and pursuits. The great modern cities of Yokohama, Osaka, and Kobe contain the largest cotton mills in the world, and weave splendid fabrics at cheap prices.

The people of Japan are very industrious. Whether toiling in rice fields up to their knees in water under a broiling sun, or doing the most skilled mechanical works, they are very efficient. Wages generally are extremely low, some of the most expert artisans receiving not more than 30 or 40 cents for a day's labor.

For situation, scenery, venerable years and bounding youth; for lofty ambitions, practical methods, and actual performance, as well as for future promise, Japan stands unique among the nations of the globe. Her energy and marvelous adaptability have enabled her to advance with unparalleled leaps and bounds to the very forefront of the leading countries along industrial, educational, commercial, and civic lines. This record speaks volumes for her capacity in the way of adaptation and assimilation.

A striking feature in the Japanese character is their intense ambition; a desire and determination to advance, to rise, to succeed; not to go below or get behind anybody. This feeling pervades all classes, and must be regarded as a potential factor in the nation's astounding progress during the last fifty years. Self-sufficiency and self-reliance are also prominent characteristics. They have exceptional powers of imitation and acquisition.

JAPS LACK IDEALISM.

The Japanese, however, are lacking in idealism. The deficiency in this respect renders the life of even the most cultured native a sort of humdrum, mechanical affair when compared with that of the westerner. His master passion is patriotism—an ardent love for his country. The man who is willing to desert his parents, wife, and children for his sovereign receives unstinted praise and most honorable recognition. He regards life less than nothing when duty demands of him a display of loyalty to the Emperor by self-renunciation and the sacrifice of his property.

But the Japanese are a wonderful people, and live in a beautiful country.

OUR BEST CUSTOMERS.

Our best customers at this time are England, France, and Germany. A certain and fixed volume of business between this country and Europe is bound to continue, with slight fluctuations, according to varying trade conditions. Most of the things we buy from or sell to these continental nations, whether coming in under tariff schedules or going out through free gates, constitute a profitable and continuous commerce, which the whole world must ultimately use or enjoy, and that too in such increasing quantities as the same shall be needed from time to time, in the way of food, fuel, shelter, and raiment and the every-day necessities of life.

Much of our so-called "political economy" has been more political than economic. We have been content in the past to play "second fiddle" to European countries, selling them our raw material at such small prices as to enable them to monopolize the oriental markets to our own detriment, instead of boldly entering the "frowning lists," in the first instance, and seizing, holding, and controlling this tremendous and valuable trade for our own benefit. All that is necessary to attain this end, to consummate this purpose, is a little patient, courageous, and intelligent concert of action on the part of our progressive cotton growers and manufacturers, our aggressive shippers, and business men.

The scheme of securing foreign markets and the means of extending our trade relations beyond the Pacific are questions worthy of our most serious consideration.

When the immense natural resources of China begin to be developed and the habits and wants of her people become more numerous and complex, as they always do in proportion to the growth of industrial life, a trade will be created across the Pacific analogous to that which now goes back and forth across the Atlantic. There is no doubt that Japan will prove equal to her mighty industrial opportunity, and the whole world, to some extent, will profit by the development which she will set in motion.

"THE LIGHT OF ASIA."

The question of more markets and better traffic facilties should be considered, therefore, in a nonpartisan spirit and in a business-like way by every patriotic citizen who hopes to see North America mistress among the commercial powers of the earth. Through the Golden Gate, which bars out the Mongolian, a new light—the light of Asia—is breaking. Our economic cry ought to be, "On to the Tropics!" Under proper conditions a rare chance is now afforded us to capture the opulent trade of the Orient. When the Panama Canal is completed, connecting the two great oceans, the southern route to the East will be shortened on an average of about 4,000 miles.

If we take advantage of our commanding geographical position, we shall discover in our Southland the far-famed Eldorado, for which the Spanish conquerors and early explorers sought in vain; a region abounding in glorious sources of enterprise; a land full of golden opportunities for the acquisition of wealth; a land possessing the fabled mines of King Solomon, laden with treasures hidden away from the gaze of men; a land as fair as the lilies of the valley; a land as rich as the splendors "by the sunbeams spun;" a land as roseate in beauty as the picturesque "gowns of Aurora's pages;" a land brimming over with health, happiness, and prosperity; a land good enough for the angels of heaven to dwell in.

A little over a half century ago Russia acquired Vladivostok from China—away up yonder past Peking, the northern capital, beyond the Yellow Sea, in the direction of the frozen regions of Siberia. She expended millions of dollars in the fortification of this magnificent fortress. At that time she had only one water route to this port, and that was through the narrow strait lying between Japan on the south and the island of Sakhalin on the north. Under a previous agreement the southern part of Sakhalin had been ceded to Japan; but Russia, naturally apprehensive that her rival, Japan, if left in possession of the territory on both sides thereof, would fortify this strait to her detriment, arbitrarily and ruthlessly refused to surrender any portion of that island to the Japanese Empire.

SOME EASTERN HISTORY.

The name of Vladivostok is significant. It means "the rule of the East." To reach this port by land Russia was forced to build a railroad, from St. Petersburg through Manchuria, 6,000 miles long. She discovered, however, that for six months in the year Vladivostok was icebound. The grip of King Boreas was upon her throat, and all commercial intercourse by water communication with the outside world during every half year was necessarily cut off.

In the years 1894–95 Japan, in her war with China, took possession of Korea and captured Port Arthur. Russia intervened and refused to allow Japan to enjoy the fruits of her victory. Weak, defenseless, with an exhausted treasury, with only a small army and without a navy, Japan was compelled to accede to Russia's terms, to wit, to accept the island of Formosa and a Chinese indemnity in lieu of Korea and Port Arthur; and, thereupon, the Czar of Russia and his cabinet entered upon a piratical scheme of national aggrandizement more audacious and far-reaching in its consequences than was ever before dreamed of in the statecraft of the world. Russia leased Port Arthur from China for a tenure of 99 years and constructed a railroad line in a southerly direction and in a zigzag fashion through Mukden and the Liao Yang Valley, a distance of about 600 miles, connecting her two great fortresses, Port Arthur and Vladivostok, on the south and north.

East of Port Arthur, lying between the Sea of China on one side and the Sea of Japan on the other, is romantically situated the island of Korea, the hermit nation. The great "White Bear" had deliberately put his strong arms around this coveted domain to crush out her national life.

As the next move on the political chessboard Russia would have constructed an impregnable fort at the southeast corner of Korea, overlooking the Pacific Ocean. With this object in view, she had already sold Alaska to the United States. With the enormous trade of Africa and Asia within her remorseless grip, with her own ships, merchant vessels, and men-of-war plying between Russian dominion and Vancouver, Seattle, San Diego, and San Francisco she would have ridden the majestic waves of the Pacific and become the proud mistress of the Orient. All the nations of the earth, with the exception, perhaps, of the United States, whose leather, hides, wool, cotton, and other raw material Russia needed in carrying on her business enterprises, would have been practically excluded from all participation in the transcendently great and rich commerce of the Far East, involving the destinies of a billion people.

IMPREGNABLE ENGLAND.

England, always alive to the advantage of foreign markets, and already possessing 47 per cent of the trade of the East, by her recent alliance with Japan will occupy in the near future substantially the same vantage ground which Russia, with such far-reaching sagacity, endeavored to acquire; and, but for the construction of the Panama Canal and our possession of the Philippine Islands, she would thereby be enabled virtually to cut off all commercial relations between the United States and these oriental countries.

It is lamentable to consider that of all this enormous trade the United States at this time, directly speaking, can claim only about 11 per cent of the whole. Of course, indirectly we enjoy a larger percentage, but miss entirely the profits of the "middleman," and the cost of the finished goods.

We are deliberately closing our eyes to the important fact that Great Britain is now, at an immense cost, constructing a naval base of operations near Singapore, with the manifest object in view of extending her trade relations and protecting her oriental interests. In the light of these undeniable facts would it be wise, if we could, to withdraw from the Philippines?

These islands are in the very heart of the Orient. From Manila Hongkong is distant 700 miles, Shanghai, 1,000 miles, Osaka 1,500 miles, and Yokohama 2,000 miles. In the commercial equation these are important figures to bear in mind. Around Manila, as a center, circle a billion people, whose trade the United States could easily command. It is apparent, therefore, that the Philippine question ought to be put outside the domain of partisan legislation. It is the part of wisdom that political agitation over that issue should cease. These islands came to us without our seeking.

We could not let them go if we desired. While we hold them, let us strive to derive a legitimate profit out of them. They may have been put into our possession, for ought we know, to fulfill the Bible prophecy, which foretold that "our vine shall run to the farthest parts of the earth and extend beyond the uttermost wall."

That prophecy seems already to have been verified.

We live under a Federal Constitution which guarantees absolute free trade between the different States of the American Union. We have established free trade relations between the United States and our territorial possessions; for instance, Alaska, Honolulu, and Porto Rico, as well as our home Territories, like New Mexico, Arizona, Oklahoma, and the Indian Territory. We have even granted to Cuba a 20 per cent preferential rate over other countries in her commercial dealings with our Republic. Common justice, as well as a uniform public policy, demands that there should no longer be any embargo on trade passing to and fro between the United States and our trans-Pacific colonies. There should be but "one standard" used in the application of a tariff rule to our territories. The application should be made equally and fairly to all alike.

With free-trade relations thus established between the United States and the Philippines our progressive business men, transporting raw materials in their own bottoms, can erect warehouses, depots, and manufactories in Manila and elsewhere in the islands, and by means of cheap labor weave fabrics at such small cost as will enable them to undersell all competitors. What Japan has done in manufacturing enterprises at Yokohama, Osaka, and Kobe, and what England has done, and will continue to do in the same industrial lines at Hongkong and Shanghai, the United States could readily accomplish with commanding superiority at Manila, Iloilo, Cebu, and Jolo in the Philippine Archipelago; but gentlemen stand upon the floor of this House and say we can not compete with Japan and England in the manufacture of goods because, forsooth, they possess an advantage over us in the way of cheap cooly labor. This argument is fallacious and absolutely without merit, in the face of the damaging truth that these very Representatives, who make this contention here, forget the important fact that Congress by legal enactment has closed the door against the Mongolian and shut him out of the Philippines. If Japan and England occupy any vantage ground over us in this respect it is because we have by our own unwise laws given it to them. The sensible thing, therefore, to do would be to so modify the Chinese exclusion act as to admit to the Philippine Islands during each year, covering a designated period of time, a limited number of coolies; and then the problem will have been solved. A naked statement of a fact like this is worth a ton of argument. A mere suggestion of the remedy is a sufficient answer to the fine-spun theories, in which the opponents of this measure delight to indulge. My friends, do not get excited. Be not alarmed. Be cautious. Do not exhibit childish fears at the imaginary approach of the "yellow peril." Do not tear your hair at the bare mention of the impossibility of Chinese labor ever coming in competition with that of the skilled American artisan and mechanic. That contingency is too remote ever to happen. The intervening space is too great. The nations are too far apart. No man who has the slightest respect for his own intelligence would be guilty of the folly of attempting seriously to hold out the pretext that a Chinaman, laboring in the far-away Orient, can ever compete with an American, either in work or wages. Fifteen million bales of cotton at this time seem amply sufficient to supply the world. When the Chinese people cease going naked, and can be induced to wear a single khaki blouse per capita each year, it will require 50,000,000 bales of cotton to meet necessary demands.

KING COTTON ON A THRONE.

God, in His infinite wisdom, has formed the cotton zone in the South. With proper labor facilities we can raise in the States south of the Potomac and east of the Mississippi, including Texas and Arkansas, all the cotton the trans-Pacific people can possibly need. Then king cotton will sit on his white throne and with his fleecy scepter sway the world. The price of the commodity will never range below 20 cents a pound, and the whole Southland will have entered upon a career of unexampled prosperity, more fruitful and enduring than it has ever been given to the tongue of man to describe.

This seems, no doubt, an extravagant view of the situation, but the picture is true to life. This is no iridescent dream—"the baseless fabric of a vision." It is more than possibility. It is reality—a certainty.

The great ocean liner, steamship Ceria, arrived at San Francisco a few days ago, having on board the imperial Chinese commissioners, Tuan Fang and Tai Hung Tzeu, with their subordinates and suites, 62 persons in all. They have crossed the Pacific to study the political and social institutions of the United States and Europe, and this Government has received them in a most kindly spirit. Progressive Chinese leaders and thinkers are already advocating the cutting off of the queue and the abolition of the frock and clogs, and the adoption of our western dress. This custom stands as a bar to China's progress and development. Unless this step is taken at an early day the Celestial Empire will die of its own senility and the vast domain will be partitioned among the great powers.

Think of it! When 600,000,000 people in Asia and Africa begin to wear shoes, cook their food on iron stoves, and dress in cotton clothes, did it ever occur to anyone in this Chamber to estimate what that will mean in the creation of wealth in this country? The East will "get busy" making shoes, the North and West will find ample employment in manufacturing stoves, and the South will have her hands full growing cotton.

But to be more effective along these lines, we must cease to pay so much attention to political vagaries and give more thought to foreign markets.

The world about us is glowing with beauty, replete with energy, and crowned with the glory of endless progress. The winds and the waves, harnessed by a power divine, are toiling on in their holy mission to catch the glad tidings sung by angel bands, "Peace on earth, good will to men." Nature bears no impressions of indolence or lawlessness in all her boundless operations for good. She is eminently benevolent. She is liberal to man's wants. She turns none away empty-handed. Obedient to the voice of her Maker, wherever there is pain, want, or suffering, there Nature, in imitation of her God, unlocks the vast storehouses of her wondrous treasures and lays them down reverently at the feet of sorrowing man. From her we learn that our most important duty on earth, in its sublimest sense, is to realize and recognize the fatherhood of God and the brotherhood of man.

Let us do justice to the Filipinos. Let us furnish them an opportunity to raise, not temporarily, but permanently, a revenue sufficient for their support, maintenance, and education. Let them reap an abundant harvest in the peace, security, happiness, and general welfare which must come to them from faithful and honest labor well performed as well as in their moral uplifting—a precious realization which fate can not lessen, reverse can not reach, the seasons can not blight, nor greed steal away. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. YOUNG] is recognized.

Mr. YOUNG. Mr. Chairman, the effect of the Philippine bill, which is the real matter under discussion before this House, if enacted into law will be to create absolute free trade in the markets of the United States proper for all Philippine products except sugar and tobacco, which are to pay 25 per cent of the Dingley rates until the 11th of April, 1909, and then also to go upon the free list.

In consideration of these concessions, the United States proper are to have the privilege of importing into the Philippines their sugar and tobacco without paying duty thereon, and after the 11th of April, 1909, the time fixed for the expiration of the agreement of the Spanish treaty, then all exports from the United States into the Philippine Islands are to be free of duty.

But before proceeding to a discussion of the main question in this bill, I wish to call the attention of the House for a moment to one of its minor features. It is provided that on articles manufactured in the United States proper and exported to the Philippines, the like of which when manufactured in the Philippines pay an internal-revenue duty there, shall pay a like duty and no other, and that articles manufactured in the Philippine Islands for export to the United States, the like of which bear an internal-revenue tax here, when manufactured in this country, shall pay a like tax and no other, and that all of the taxes collected either upon imports into the Philippine Islands or exports from the Philippine Islands into the United States shall find their way finally into the Philippine treasury.

Mr. Chairman, this seems to me a somewhat remarkable provision. I do not believe there is anything like it in legislation anywhere except in our dealings with our own insular possessions. To illustrate, if alcohol is made in this country for export into the Philippine Islands it is free from the internal-revenue tax of $1.10 imposed here, and pays the much lower tax imposed in the Philippine Islands. I am at a loss to understand how this provision benefits the Filipino or the people of the United States either. It amounts to a bounty paid to the American manufacturer for importing his alcohol into the Philippines, and if when we charge our own rate of taxation upon our exports the Philippine manufacturer has a little advantage in his own market, I for one say, for God's sake give him the benefit of it. That is one of the things we can do for him legitimately. In the same way, when alcohol is manufactured in the Philippine Islands for export to the United States it does not pay the Philippine internal-revenue tax, but pays the much higher tax imposed by the laws of the United States proper. In other words, we pay bounty to the American manufacturer for importing his alcohol into the Philippine Islands and we charge the Philippine manufacturer an additional charge for sending his alcohol to the United States. I can understand that the object of the committee was to place the revenues of these two manufactures on an equality in each of these markets, but it seems to me that they forgot for a moment their benevolent intention toward the Filipino people—"their plain duty," as the gentleman from New York calls it. But they only forgot it for a moment, for they then provided that all of this tax, whether imposed on the imports to the Philippine Islands or the exports from the Philippine Islands should find their way to the Philippine treasury. I am at a loss to conceive any reason for the payment of internal-revenue taxes imposed on one of our domestic products into the Philippine treasury that would not be equally cogent for paying into that treasury a part of the proceeds of the sales of our own public lands or a part of our customs duties that are collected upon the imports into this country from foreign nations. In other words, it is a plain case of almsgiving, and yet given in such dubious ways as to leave an impression in the minds of those grown-up children for whose benefit it was intended that it is something they are entitled to.

If we are to go into the business of almsgiving for the Philippine Islands, do it openly and in such a manner that all may know that it is almsgiving.

Now, let us turn to the main features of this bill. It was testified before the Taft party in the Philippines by one John T. McLeod, who appeared there as the representative of the Manila Chamber of Commerce, that the highest taxes ever paid in the islands under the domination of Spain were those imposed for the fiscal year 1894–95, and that that budget in round figures was 13,580,000 pesos, while under our beneficent reign there the amount has increased to 23,000,000 pesos for insular administration alone, and to this amount must be added the sum of 7,000,000 pesos of provincial and municipal taxation, making a total of over 30,000,000 pesos, or more than twice the largest amount ever imposed by Spain. So it seems that notwithstanding our benevolent intentions there, and possibly a little because of our benevolent intentions, and in spite of the impoverishment of that country by the war, rinderpest, cholera, and other causes about which we have heard, the startling and striking fact that stands out so that all may see is that we have increased the burden of that people to double what the tyranny of Spain imposed.

It was said by one gentleman who appeared before the committee that our salary list was greater than the entire Spanish budget. I do not know whether this be so or not, but it is evident that that people are becoming impatient under the double load imposed by their poverty and the burden of the government. One gentleman said that we were doing a great work in the Philippines, but he thought we were going too fast—faster than the people could afford to pay.

But of course there is another side to this matter. When we went into the islands there was hardly a road there. The schools, where any existed at all, were in wretched condition according to the American standard. A great deal of our expense has gone into much-needed roads and other public improvements and into the establishment and maintenance of the schools.

If these islands are to be improved at all, it must be through better education and training, in habits of steady industry, and modern methods of agriculture, business, and manufacture. You can not do it by mere almsgiving. As great as our expenditures have been, it is too evident that there is need for still greater expenditures.

We have between 400,000 and 500,000 children in the schools there, but there are thrice as many who are not enjoying and can not enjoy such advantages under the present conditions.

The gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. HILL] stated before the Taft party in the hearings there that the expense of the Filipino government was made up by the following taxes: Internal revenue, 6,000,000 pesos; customs duties, 16,000,000 pesos; land tax, 2,000,000 pesos; making a grand total of 24,000,000 pesos. It was a remarkable thing, gentlemen, that the Filipino witnesses who appeared before that committee—I suppose we may call it a committee properly—demanded free trade with the United States, and also demanded that the land tax be abolished or suspended, and that the internal-revenue taxes be lowered. This, they said, was necessary on account of the depression of business and agriculture there. So it would seem that what the Filipino people object to principally is any taxes at all and not any particular form of taxation. [Laughter.]

Mr. MANN. Are they not like everybody else in that respect?

Mr. YOUNG. Somewhat; but the people of the United States pay their taxes pretty cheerfully. If the building of roads is to go on there; if the education of the people is to go on there; if civilization and improvement and progress are to go on there, it is very evident that at least the present rate of taxation must be maintained. Thirty million pesos, equivalent only to $15,000,000, does not seem a very extravagant amount of taxation annually for the government of seven and a half millions of people. If we can save a little from salaries there and dispense with unnecessary officials, it can well be expended in education and the building of roads and the making of other improvements.

Now, the only effect of this bill on revenue, so far as it affects it at all, will be to reduce it. The customs duties collected on imports into this country, except sugar and tobacco, are to cease at once, and on sugar and tobacco they are greatly lowered and are to cease entirely in three years' time. At the end of that time the duties on all goods imported from the United States into the Philippines are to cease. It is but reasonable to suppose that under the stimulus of this advantage our trade with the Philippine Islands will considerably increase, and I have no doubt that that is one of the purposes which gentlemen who favor this bill have had in view.

But, sir, as our trade with the Philippine Islands increases, her trade with the rest of the world will correspondingly decrease. The transfer of every dollar of trade from the rest of the world to the United States must decrease the revenue. Customs duties now furnish fully two-thirds of the revenue of these islands. Every dollar that you strike off there you must add in some form to the internal taxation. So I say that this bill will not lessen in the least the burdens of that people. You will merely shift the burden to internal taxation.

The gentleman from New York said, the other day, that the internal taxes were not working as smoothly there as he expected or as had been expected. Indeed, I think that this bill strikes out that form of taxation which is easiest collected there and which is the least irritating to the people, for it is the kind of taxation to which they are accustomed.

Now, it may be admitted that the maintenance of a tariff between the different portions of the United States proper, even were it constitutional, can not be justified.

We may go further and say that if these islands are to remain permanently in our possession the time will come when we must remove all tariff barriers between them and the United States proper, and we can say this without in the least impairing the argument against this bill. Every fair-minded man will admit that there is little analogy between this case and that which would arise between two States of the American Union. The Supreme Court of the United States has drawn this distinction sharply. These islands are with us, but not of us. Our constitutional guaranties do not extend to them. The government there we impose upon them. It does not spring from what they are pleased to call their "aspirations." It is purely paternal, and while they enjoy a greater measure of self-government there than ever before and are soon to enjoy a still greater measure of self-government, yet they receive it from us as a gift. They did not achieve or establish it as our forefathers achieved and established the American Union. They do not contribute one single dollar to the support of the Federal Government. We even pay all the expenses of the Philippine Scouts—native Filipinos who are kept there for the purpose of preserving order. They are an alien race; they are a race in an early stage of development.

The distinguished gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE] the other day said that the Filipino had the judgment of a 12-year-old boy, and every fair-minded observer who has been to the Philippines comes back with the statement that they are utterly incapable of self-government. To apply to our relations with them theories and principles derived from the relations between the States of the American Union is absurd and may prove disastrous. [Applause.] In the letter and in the spirit I accede to the doctrine that having accepted the trust imposed upon us by the result of the Spanish war to govern this people, we must govern them for their own interest, and not exploit them for ours: but I recognize also that we are charged with the government of the continental United States, and that that nation is the hope of the world and that the Filipinos are not. It is our duty also to govern our own people in their own interest, and while we should deal justly and fairly with the Filipinos we should not sacrifice or endanger the interests of the Republic. [Applause.] Do not do it for any quixotic scheme of playing the part of universal Providence to the poor and ignorant and worthless of all nations. The distinguished gentleman from New York said that he did not believe this bill would benefit the Filipinos except to give them courage, but that we must pass it because it was right and our duty, nay, "our plain duty," to do so.

I wish to say to the distinguished gentleman from New York that, much as I respect and honor him, that statement does not satisfy either my judgment or my conscience. And the gentleman from Ohio intimated the other day that he should vote for this bill because it was a duty he owed to his Creator, and that even if some people were hurt he did not care very much about it, because it was his plain duty. These gentlemen are shifting the question. Every man in this House, I take it, wishes to do his plain duty; but the question here is not about doing that. The question is, what is our plain duty? I am not quite so sure as I was two short years ago, when I entered this House, that being right consists in following the distinguished gentleman from New York on all and every occasion, whenever and wherever he may lead. "The King can do no wrong," but I have never heard that that immunity extended to even the great of his ministers. That distinguished gentleman, if anything, is usually sane and sensible. No man knows better than he that statesmanship does not consist in uttering sounding phrases and pronouncing high moral sentiments, but rather in the humbler and more useful occupation of framing practical remedies for present evils. This being so, I can not subscribe to the statement that it is right and our plain duty to pass a bill which will do no good, even though it is conceived in the spirit of the Sermon on the Mount. And as to the gentleman's statement that it will give the Filipinos courage, I reply that when they find it does them no good they will be correspondingly depressed [applause], and that then one of those political conditions may arise about which the President speaks in his message, one of those political conditions which may cause the loss of American blood and the spending of American treasure. We must diagnose this disease in the Philippines correctly before we can remedy it. From all the testimony, I ask what causes the depression there? I say it is not the war, it is not the death of the carabao, it was not the rinderpest, nor the cholera. First and foremost it is the ignorance and oriental indolence of this tropical people.

The gentleman from Ohio, who has lately been there, said the other day that the Filipinos not only were lazy, but they thought it was dishonorable to work. There is want of capital there after three hundred years of Christianity and Spanish rule and what they call "civilization," because these people are too ignorant and too indolent to create it. They are paying as high as 40 per cent annually for the use of money, because they are too ignorant and too indolent and too improvident to improve the advantages they have and create and accumulate wealth there. Then they say that there is a want of labor in the Philippine Islands—a want of labor where seven and a half millions of people are living on less than 7,000,000 acres of land, not half of which they cultivate. They tell us the sugar industry is unprofitable, and if it be true the cause is not far to seek. They merely scratch the surface of the ground there with a wooden plow. They never use any fertilizers there, although some of that land has been cropped for more than a hundred years. The sugar mill is so crude that the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. HILL] told us that if you put two stalks of cane into it at once it stopped; so crude that they save only 60 per cent of the sugar which is produced upon the land, while a modern mill, such as is used in Hawaii or in our own Southern States, will save over 90 per cent.

And then they tell us that their methods are so crude, and the sugar in consequence is so poor, that after they have made allowance for the difference in strength between it and 96 per cent sugar they still have to sell it at one-half a cent a pound less than the American market price. The gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. HILL] told us that in many instances—in fact, I believe, he made no limitation—that when you double the pay of a Filipino workman he would only work half as many days. Maybe that is the reason that under Spanish rule they were able to export 261,000 tons of sugar besides what they used at home, while they now raise but 180,000 tons altogether.

The gentleman from Connecticut, you will remember, summed it all up, in strong and earnest words, to the effect that the mind of man could not conceive, if he had not seen it, nor could the English language find words to express, the primitiveness of these people and the crudeness of their industries. This is the picture gentlemen who favor this bill draw of the industries of these people. Now, what is their remedy for all this indolence and ignorance? It is to make it easier for this people to live without work, to make it easier for them to live without improving their present methods! I never heard before that a lazy man could be made industrious by filling his pockets with money or a fossil made progressive by making it easier for him to compete. This proposed remedy does not go to the root of this matter. This people must be weaned from their indolence and taught steady, persistent industry. They must be taught to wish for a broader and a richer life.

You remember that Shakespeare puts in the mouth of Lear, on the occasion when his daughters wished to deprive him of his train, the words:

> O, reason not the need: * * *
> Allow not nature more than nature needs,
> Man's life is cheap as beast's.

And that is the trouble in the Philippine Islands. They have no want for anything higher than a waist string and a banana. Their life is cheap as beast's, not because we oppress them, but because they have no ambition and will not work.

We must have a modern sugar mill there, as we have already an experimental farm, and teach these people modern methods, and then, sirs, I think that worthy and honest planters there should be aided to obtain money upon reasonable terms. Gentlemen will say this is paternalism. Of course it is, but our entire government over there is paternal, and when you are up to your neck in paternalism an inch or two more does not make any difference. [Laughter.] We have got to have better transportation there. We must reduce the cost of moving these products by building better roads and more of them. With stability in the government do not fear but that the enterprise of the American people will carry capital there. But if gentlemen who are urging the passage of this bill have given a fair account of the conditions there, they ask, "What have we to fear from them?" The distinguished gentleman from New York says that he has faith in American brains and enterprise and sneers at the idea that the intelligent labor here has anything to fear from the Philippines. This argument is an old and familiar one, but it has oftener been heard from the other side of the House. The gentleman from New York is camping to-night where the gentleman from Missouri camped last night, and in the future Tantalon's robber stronghold may well be called upon to do duty to illustrate, to illume, to adorn, and to ornament the speeches of both of these distinguished gentlemen indiscriminately and interchangeably. [Applause.] Is underpaid labor less a menace to the conditions under which we are so proud to say the American laborer lives because it happens to come from a territory over which our flag waves? The whole country, both sides of this House, seem to feel that a few thousand Chinamen are a great menace to the industries of this country and the welfare of our laboring men; but, sirs, I ask, what about the seven and one-half million of Filipinos, whom the gentleman from Connecticut tells us will soon be 25,000,000? Are they no menace? But these gentlemen who stand sponsors for this bill, frank and honest as they are, in their zeal for its passage, forget to dwell on certain features of the Philippine situation that can not honestly and fairly be blinked at by this Congress.

It is these which render the farmers and manufacturers engaged in the beet-sugar industry apprehensive. There seems to be a good deal of difference of opinion about the acreage over there which is capable of cultivation. The total number of the acres of the islands has been fixed by actual survey as some 73,000,000 acres, and the gentleman from Connecticut tells us that only 9½ per cent of that is capable of cultivation. I am not so certain about these prophecies. You know it was James Russell Lowell who said, "Don't prophesy onless you know." [Applause.] I have seen too many such estimates that had to be revised in the light of wider knowledge. Why, gentlemen, over here in the Land Office is a report made by an expert sent out by the Government in the early part of the last century to examine the southern peninsula of Michigan, and there in this grave official document he states that the entire lower peninsula of Michigan is one malarious swamp, that three-fourths of it is below the water level of Lake Michigan and Lake Huron. He says that it never can be inhabited by anybody but aquatic animals and that nothing will grow there but aquatic plants, and yet, sirs, that country to-day supports over 2,000,000 people whom we think are fairly well civilized. [Applause.] Why, in 1834, a little later, when Michigan made application for admission to the family of States, there was a dispute arose between her and Ohio as to the boundary line over a little strip of land 6 miles in width and 60 miles long. The National Congress decided that dispute in favor of Ohio, but to compensate Michigan they gave her the entire upper peninsula, and she objected and protested against receiving it. She said that it was a barren waste of rock and sand, and yet that despised country is one of her brightest jewels. [Applause.] It is one of her richest possessions, not only in mineral wealth, but in agricultural resources also. There is not a gentleman in this House who is over 50 years of age who does not remember in the geography he studied in his youth that a large section of the West was called the "American Desert," and yet large portions of that area to-day are covered with beautiful farms and happy homes that in the proper season for them are made rich and beautiful by the waving grain. [Applause.] And the gentleman from Colorado told us in eloquent language of the beautiful and stately city of Denver that had arisen within the borders of that territory. So I am not inclined to put too much faith in any cut-and-dried estimate that only 9 per cent of the Philippine territory is capable of cultivation. [Applause.] But the gentleman from Connecticut stated that his authority for this statement was to be found on page 181, volume 4, of the Philippine Census. An examination of that page does not support his contention, as the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. BROOKS] so well showed the other day. The statement there given is not an estimate of land capable of cultivation, but a statement of lands which are already set off into farms.

The table is preceded by this statement:

> The people are extremely gregarious and live in villages, and the spaces of land between the villages are, as a rule, unpopulated, and these intervening tracts, frequently of great extent, are almost wholly uncultivated and practically unused except in a limited way for grazing purposes.

There is no hint that these unused spaces are not as capable of cultivation as those that are already cultivated. Further on, you will remember, Mr. Welborn, the commissioner of agriculture, who appears here in behalf of this bill, stated that there are 180,000 acres of land in sugar; that you could easily double, that you could easily treble, that you could easily quadruple it, and he was not certain whether you could not increase it tenfold or not.

But I wish to call your attention to another official document which settles that question beyond all chance of controversy. Perhaps it is thrashing over old straw to follow the gentleman from Colorado on this point, but, sirs, the gentleman from Connecticut, who gave us so instructive a speech the other day, indicated that he was not satisfied with the demonstration of the gentleman from Colorado. And so I will turn to this official document, called "Bulletin 1—Population of the Philippines," and issued by the Department of Commerce and Labor in 1904. The article from which I read is signed by J. P. Sanger, the director of the Philippine census, as follows:

> Setting aside the intermediate water space, amounting to 717,042 square miles, and considering the land alone, the area is estimated to be 115,026 square miles, or 73,616,640 acres. Of this, about 12,000,000 are private lands and over 61,000,000 public land. Of the latter, 40,000,000 or more are forest lands, leaving about 21,000,000 available for agriculture.

This, remember, is all the public lands, and does not include the farms, amounting to over 7,000,000 acres. Then the report goes on:

> Much of the land covered by forests is of great richness, and if cleared would be capable of a very high degree of cultivation.

It is not mountain peaks, it is not the craters of dead volcanoes. It is capable of a high degree of cultivation. Then he adds:

This may be said of nearly all parts of the Philippines, in which the soil is especially adapted to tropical agriculture, producing all kinds of tropical fruits and vegetables and many of those usual to the temperate zone.

Truly Secretary Taft was justified in his early conclusion that the agricultural possibilities of the islands were practically unlimited. And our own sugar producers are not merely scared by hobgoblins of their own raising when they view this situation with some degree of alarm.

The testimony taken before the Philippine Commission as to the cost of making sugar there under present conditions is somewhat contradictory. The statement made to Mr. Hathaway by the sugar planters themselves indicate that the cost in the warehouses in Iloilo was about three-quarters of a cent a pound. The distinguished gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE], the leader of this House, was inclined to speak sarcastically and disparagingly of Mr. Hathaway. But I wish to say to this House that up in Michigan where we know him there is no man that is not glad to call him friend. [Applause.] And no one there would think any more of doubting his word upon a matter of fact which he said he had seen, than they would doubt the word of the most distinguished gentleman in this body.

Now, then, in the Philippine Census, in volume 4, page 32, Commissioner Luziriaga says:

Formerly the cost of production of a picul of sugar ready for market did not fall below $1.50 Mexican currency. Since the war, however, operating expenses have considerably increased. It is estimated at present the cost of producing a picul of sugar ready for market is all the way from $2.50 to $3 or even $3.50.

One dollar and a half Mexican currency would be 75 cents in gold.

Well, take $3, which is the highest amount given, except in a few special instances, and we have $1.50 in gold for 140 pounds of sugar. Other testimony there went as high as $1.88 a hundred. The gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE] said with fine sarcasm in his tone, that Mr. Hathaway represented the beet-sugar interests, and that he represented to the planters over there that he intended to buy sugar land, and so he said it was a case of swapping horses, where each man cracked up his own property. The allusion was not an especially happy one, for it might suggest itself to some Members in this House that the Ways and Means Committee are also engaged in swapping horses, and that (unconsciously perhaps) they were swapping off the American farmer and the American laborer, with their style of living, for the peon of the Philippines, who dresses, as the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. HILL] described him, in a waist string. [Applause.] And in that game of wits, allow me to say, Yankee shrewdness did not appear to any great advantage by the side of Filipino cunning. If these planters had an object in understating the cost of sugar to Mr. Hathaway, they also had an object in overstating it to this committee.

And it may be that Commissioner Luziriaga's statement that it was about 1 cent per pound, made to the Agricultural Department, comes nearest the truth, for it was made before this controversy arose and without reference to it. If it is correct, and it is a statement of the Filipino Commissioner, made in an official document when he was under no inducement to falsify, then it amounts to about $2.20 or $2.30 per hundred for Philippine sugar free on board New York, present duty paid; and that is a price which no cane-sugar manufacturer and no beet raiser of this country can meet.

The effect of this bill is to put our labor in competition with Filipino labor; and let us see what the wages paid respectively in the United States and the Philippines really are. It is another way to make this comparison. The wages in the beet fields of Michigan are at least $1.50 a day; and Mr. Hathaway and Mr. Humphrey and the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. FORDNEY], who are all familiar with this subject, have stated that one laborer in Michigan can cultivate 5 acres and only 5 acres, and that the average yield in Michigan is 1,960 pounds of refined sugar. In the Philippines all the witnesses agree that one man can cultivate 2½ acres, and the cane produced there, at the very lowest estimate given by the gentleman from New York, is one long ton—2,240 pounds—of raw sugar, or 2,000 pounds of refined sugar per acre. So that two men in the islands will raise as much sugar as one man in Michigan. About these facts there is not any dispute. I have taken the figures of the gentlemen who favor this bill. Now, the wages of the farm laborer in Negros, where eight-tenths of this sugar is raised, was stated in the Philippine census at 30 centavos or 16⅔ cents per day. Commissioner Luziriaga stated before the Taft committee that it was now 20 to 30 cents a day, and De la Rama—and you remember that De la Rama is the man upon whom the gentlemen on the other side of this question place so much reliance—said that before the war 3 to 4 pesos a month without food was paid to the agricultural laborer, and now a little over twice that with food. Taking the highest figures he named, 4 pesos a month, and then double that and then add another for full measure, making it 9 pesos per month, equals 18 cents in gold per day, and then you add to that 5 cents for food and you have 23 cents as De la Rama's statement of the wages; and one man there cultivates half as much sugar as a man in Michigan.

Mr. Welborn said in his public report on agriculture of 1904 that the wages there were not quite 15 cents a day. Mr. Hathaway says they are nominally 13 cents in Negros, 14 cents in Panay. He further said that an actual state of peonage existed there, although it was unlawful, and that the men did not actually receive this amount, but they received the lowest amount on which they could live. Governor Wright, commenting on that statement of Mr. Hathaway, says it is to some extent an exaggeration, thus admitting that it is substantially correct. The effect, then, of this bill is to put the labor of the United States in direct competition with the labor of peons, who nominally receive from 13 to 25 cents a day, and do half as much work as one of our laborers. If these peons lived in India or China, how the distinguished gentleman from New York and the no less distinguished gentleman from Pennsylvania and his friend from Ohio would arise and protest against that outrage; and yet the injury to American labor is just the same whether they live under one flag or under another.

The object of protection—the main object, if I understand it aright—is to maintain the present style of living for the American workingman. But gentlemen say that this fear of competition is but a fantastic dream arising out of an uneasy conscience; that we forget the crude methods and the ignorance and the indolence. My answer is to fling back the statement of the distinguished gentleman from New York, when he said that he had faith in American energy and American genius. These bright men, American capitalists, will not long permit all of these rich and fertile fields to go uncultivated or that wealth of cheap labor to go to waste. Soon American brains and skill will be directing industrial operations there, substituting modern machinery and methods for the antiquated methods of today, paying for it with good American capital, and with the advantage offered by this cheap labor, forcing our own labor into an unequal combat, from which these capitalists will no doubt acquire wealth, but which will benefit the Filipino laborer very little.

We are now, I believe, at the parting of the ways. The other day the gentleman from Massachusetts said protection is no child of ours, and he went on to tell us truthfully, as we all know, how it was forced upon the reluctant people of Massachusetts, and you all remember how it was protested against by Daniel Webster when he represented the State of Massachusetts. But after it was established, after the people there had accommodated themselves to it and invested their money under it, then Mr. Webster, wisely changing with the changed conditions, demanded that those people should be protected. So it will be here. Every man who, after this bill passes, if it does pass, invests one dollar in machinery or land in the Philippine Islands will say he did it in reliance upon this bill. [Applause.] Whether it be true or not, I do not know how we can refuse his claim to consideration. So I say we are at the parting of the ways. If this bill is passed it means free trade forever between this country and the Philippines so long as they are under the American flag. I am opposed to this bill, first, because I believe it will do the real Filipino no good. Of no country was it ever truer that the people perish for want of knowledge. They need the bread of enlightenment, and you offer them the stone of tariff reduction. [Applause.] I am opposed to this bill, second, because these duties are needed to develop the islands, and you can offer no substitute for them but direct taxation. Third, I am opposed to this bill because you endanger an industry in which our own people have invested millions of dollars. [Applause.] They have invested it on the pledged faith of the Republican party that they should be protected. [Applause.] And finally, I am opposed to it because you place the American farmer in direct competition with labor that is paid not to exceed 25 cents per day and is one-half as efficient as his own.

I yield to no man in this House in my desire to raise up and benefit the Filipino people. I will vote for any measure presented for that purpose which I believe will not do an equal injury to our home people. [Applause.] And when by enlightenment and industrial training in the use of American capital and better methods you have raised the common people of the Philippines to a somewhat higher standard of living, when they have discarded the waist string for the habiliments of civilization, and when they are paying their fair proportion of the expenses of this Government, and when they have ceased to be a pensioner upon its bounty, then, but not until then, I believe they should be admitted to equal privileges in our markets. [Applause.] Until that time we should proceed with caution, that we do not in our benevolent intentions fracture that noble fabric of liberty and independence and civilization which our forefathers and ourselves have reared upon this continent. [Applause.]

Mr. THOMAS of North Carolina. Mr. Chairman, this bill opens up for discussion very properly two very interesting and important questions, one of them the attitude of the Government toward the Philippines and our island possessions, and the other question the policy of the Government upon the subject of the tariff. To both of these subjects, Mr. Chairman, I profess to have given some little study and investigation. In fact, I have long ago learned in this House that it is unwise to discuss any question in which you are not interested and to which you have not given at least some study and investigation.

WHAT OUR PHILIPPINE POLICY MEANS.

Now, upon this first subject in the Fifty-sixth Congress I expressed my individual views in no uncertain language. In the Fifty-sixth Congress I said, speaking with reference to the attitude of the Government toward the Philippines and all our island possessions:

I do not believe that by the treaty with Spain we should ever have acquired this territory, but, having acquired it, I believe to hold this territory in the far Orient is fraught with far greater danger to the Republic than to give its inhabitants their independence.

When I said that, Mr. Chairman, I did not mean to advocate what is called "the scuttle policy," for under no circumstances would our Government turn those islands adrift without giving them proper protection, without reserving coaling stations and trade privileges, and securing reimbursement of the twenty millions of dollars paid Spain; but I meant that, under the genius and theory of our free institutions, our great Government should never hold any people incapable of being assimilated with our population, and any territory incapable of being converted into States. While we should never haul down the American flag while it floats over free American territory, that flag should never float over conquered and subject provinces. [Applause.] In his interesting sketch of Cæsar, the historian, Froude, says:

If there be one lesson that history clearly teaches, it is this—that free nations can not govern subject provinces. If they are unable or unwilling to admit their dependencies to share their own constitution, the constitution itself will fall in pieces from mere incompetence for its duties.

Now, Mr. Chairman, when we annexed the Philippine Islands, what did it mean? I showed in the same speech in the Fifty-sixth Congress that the acquisition of the Philippines meant the subjugation and forcible annexation of our former allies; that it meant, not a legitimate, homogeneous expansion, but the English colonial system, or a similar system; that it meant the spirit of gain and commercial greed or lust for gold was to override and obscure the advice and warning of the founders of the Republic under a plea of manifest destiny; that it meant, if the Philippines were to be retained permanently, a total departure from the past theory and practice of our Republic for the sake of trade with these islands, China, and Asiatic countries, the advantages of which had been greatly exaggerated; that it meant foreign alliances and foreign entanglements, from which heretofore we have happily been free; that it meant a practical abandonment of the spirit if not the letter of the Monroe doctrine, which heretofore has preserved the peace and happiness in a large measure of the Western Hemisphere; that the permanent retention of the Philippines meant, also, a large standing army and navy, quadruple at least their present size, and a constantly increasing expense of maintaining our fleets and armies in the archipelago; that it meant the beginning of a career of acquisition and conquest upon which other republics have entered with the same belief in their superiority and integrity only to find that the end was disaster and possibly the destruction of a republican form of government.

There are but two logical positions which we can take with reference to the Philippine Islands—one is to regard them as American territory in all respects, and the other is to grant them their independence.

VIEWS OF THE DEMOCRATIC MINORITY ON THE PENDING BILL.

Under the existing law and the decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States in the insular cases the Philippine Archipelago, as clearly set forth in the views of the minority upon this bill, "occupy a most anomalous status." They are treated as American territory for certain purposes and as foreign or semiforeign territory for certain other purposes. "According to the whim of Congress or the Executive, they are considered as American or foreign, or as both American and foreign, or as neither American nor foreign," and in justice to both the Filipinos and ourselves they should be considered as "altogether American or altogether foreign. So long as we retain them we favor the establishment and maintenance of free trade betwixt them and the United States."

The bill of the minority proposes free trade between the Philippines and the balance of the domain of the United States.

The bill of the minority, the Democratic bill, and report are as follows:

[House Report No. 20, part 2, Fifty-ninth Congress, first session.]

The undersigned members of the minority of the committee believe that the anomalous and preposterous status of the Philippine Islands, by which they are treated as American territory for certain purposes and as foreign or semiforeign territory for certain other purposes, can not be long maintained and should be immediately terminated.

At present, according to the whim of Congress or the Executive, they are considered as American or foreign, or as both American and foreign, or as neither American nor foreign.

In justice to both the Filipinos and ourselves they should be considered as altogether American or altogether foreign.

So long as we retain them we favor the establishment and maintenance of free trade betwixt them and the United States.

The party which we in part represent desires to get rid of them at the earliest practicable moment, and we welcome the dissatisfaction of the hitherto legislatively favored classes, growing out of the competition of the products of Philippine labor with our own products in our own market, as a possible moving cause to governmental divorce between the Philippine Archipelago and the balance of the United States.

For these reasons we offer as a substitute for H. R. 3 H. R. 406, which is in words and figures as follows:

"A bill to secure to the Philippine Islands free trade with the balance of the domain of the United States.

"Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That from and after the date of the passage of this act all goods, wares, merchandise, or other articles, being the growth or product of any of the islands forming a part of the archipelago called the Philippines, or of the island of Guam, when shipped to any port of Hawaii, Porto Rico, or to any other port of the United States, shall enter any said port free of import duty.

"SEC. 2. That from and after the passage of this act all goods, wares, merchandise, and other articles, being the growth or product of Porto Rico, Hawaii, or any other appurtenance, Territory, or State of the domain of the United States, when shipped to any port of the Philippines or Guam shall enter any said port free of import duty.

"SEC. 3. That all existing provisions of law enacted by the Congress, by the Philippine Commission, or by any other authority whatsoever, civil or military, which are in conflict with the provisions of this act are hereby repealed: Provided, however, That nothing herein contained shall be construed to repeal the provisions of a treaty of peace entered into at Paris, France, on the 10th day of December, 1898, by and between the United States of America and His Majesty the King of Spain, and confirmed by the Senate of the United States on the 6th day of February, 1899."

If the substitute herein proposed is voted down we will support H. R. 3, being the bill reported by the majority, on the principle that it is a long step in the logical and right direction.

WILL NOT HARM AMERICAN INTERESTS.

But independently of the Democratic minority report I think we ought to pass this bill for three reasons: First, because it is in accordance with Democratic policy to reduce the rates of the Dingley tariff law wherever possible to lighten its burdens, and to regard the islands as wholly American territory as long as we own them and until they have an independent government. It is a step in the logical and right direction.

Second, it is only justice to the Filipinos, who are the wards of the Government, to grant them freer trade with us.

Third, because I do not entertain the fears of some of my good friends on this side and the other side of the House that this bill is going to harm any American interests. I am unable to see that it will affect them to any appreciable extent or at all. On the contrary, as the bill is framed the effect upon American tobacco, of the quality raised in the South, may be advantageous, American tobacco being more likely to go to the Philippine Islands than their product to come here.

The hearings before the Ways and Means Committee showed that the Filipinos are unable to produce the light-colored wrapper so essential to American trade, and which their own export trade is demanding.

As to the effect of the bill upon the sugar interests of Louisiana, or the beet-sugar interests of the West, I am not so fully informed, nor do I care to discuss that phase of the pending bill. So far as I am personally concerned I shall adopt the views of the Democratic minority upon these questions. They do not fear any harm to American interests after full and careful investigation. The committee report says, as to tobacco:

With absolute free trade both ways, it would seem that American tobacco is more likely to go to the Philippine Islands than that their product should come here. They are unable to produce a light-colored wrapper, so essential to our trade, and which their own export trade is demanding. The Georgia and Florida growers claim that they are now producing in large quantities under shade a wrapper equal in every respect to the Sumatra leaf and at a cost of 75 cents per pound to the trade. The real Sumatra wrapper imported into the United States costs $1 per pound, with the additional $1.85 duty added. The Philippine Islands are now importing from Sumatra leaf tobacco of a quality inferior to that imported by us and at a cost of $1.50 per pound, including the duty. They have experimented with our Connecticut wrapper in manufacturing cigars, and believe that it will take the place of the Sumatra wrapper which they are importing when we remove the duty on the Connecticut wrapper going into the Philippine Islands.

As to sugar, I understand from the speech of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CLARK], who has fully investigated the matter, that the whole area of land that can be cultivated in the Philippine Islands, according to the most liberal estimate, is only about 35,000 square miles, just about the size of that portion of the State of Missouri south of the Missouri River. In 1904 we imported from the Philippines 25,489 tons of sugar only.

WILL BENEFIT COTTON MANUFACTURES FOR WHATEVER THE MARKET IS WORTH.

But, Mr. Chairman, there is one feature of this bill which I think will benefit American interests, and especially benefit the people of my section.

The 11th day of April, 1909, is the date fixed by this bill for the abolition of all tariffs between the United States and the Philippine Islands, and on and after that date the Philippine Islands, for whatever the market is worth, will be open to all cotton manufactures of North Carolina and of the South. This should have been done long ago, but it seems to me that will be the effect of the bill. The language of the bill is as follows:

That on and after the 11th day of April, 1909, all articles and merchandise going from the United States into the Philippine Islands and all articles wholly the growth and product of the Philippine Islands coming into the United States from the Philippine Islands shall be admitted free of duty.

Now, certainly, after April 11, 1909, the effect of that legislation will be to open up the market in the Philippine Islands for whatever it is worth to us for the cotton goods manufactured in North Carolina and the South.

I hope the market may be of some value to us. It is about time we should realize some profit in this Philippine business.

This bill is but one step in a series of legislative acts in the past and in the future with reference to these remote possessions. Unless I shall be able to see in the future more profit in holding these island possessions than I have been able to see in the past, I would gladly unite with any insurgents from the Republican majority for the purpose of fixing some date upon which these islands shall have absolute independence. This action on the part of Congress would solve many of the vexing problems which molest and disturb us. I would do so because I believe that any people who are incapable of assimilation—and I believe the Filipinos are incapable of assimilation—should not become citizens of our country, and any territory which is incapable of being converted into States of the American Union should not be retained as a permanent part of our possessions. But, Mr. Chairman, my purpose in this debate is not so much to discuss either the pending bill or the policy of the country toward the Philippine Islands, but a question which is germane to the bill, and, notwithstanding all the outcry of the politicians, is a living and burning issue before the American people, namely, the question of tariff revision.

TARIFF REVISION AND RECIPROCITY.

Now, Mr. Chairman, to proceed to the second subject involved in the discussion of this bill, namely, the policy of the Government upon the tariff. You all remember who were in it that when the last Congress convened there was much discussion as to the prospect of tariff revision. Even many Republicans felt then, and feel now, that this issue must be faced and met and solved in such manner as would best redound to the interests of the country. The agitation begun in the Fifty-eighth Congress was silenced for a time by the politicians of the Republican party, and the cry of the politicians was "stand pat." They said, "Let the tariff schedules alone," and did not heed the demands of the people. Though William McKinley in his last great speech at Buffalo, before he was stricken down by the assassin's bullet, made a strong plea for new and wider markets, gentlemen of the majority, and although President Roosevelt at times, and the Democratic party at all times, has warned the country of the dangers of monopoly built up and fostered by a high protective tariff, the cry of the politicians was heeded. Other questions for the time being obscured the consideration of this great issue, which has deserved and received the best thought of Clay, Calhoun, Webster, Benton, Walker, Blaine, McKinley, Wilson, Dingley, and all the greatest of our statesmen. We discussed the construction of the Panama Canal; we discussed the regulation of railway rates, and the result was the passage of the Esch-Townsend bill and a full investigation of that subject this summer by a committee of the Senate. But these questions of the canal and the regulation of railway rates, live as they then were and live as they now are, can not obscure and will not obscure in the mind of the country the absolute necessity in the near future of some legislation upon the tariff for the relief of the consumers, and of our agricultural and manufacturing interests, for new markets are needed for both. Like Banquo's ghost, this question will not down and it can not be obscured by all the arts of the politicians, because the question of new and wider markets, gentlemen of the majority, is becoming now a world-wide problem and our statesmen must solve it or we must meet with retaliation abroad and stagnation of business at home. The issue can not be dodged; it can not be evaded; it must be solved and solved now. There are two ways to my mind, gentlemen, in which this question can be solved. First, by proper revision of the tariff schedules, and, second, by reciprocal trade agreements with foreign countries. Whichever method you choose, tariff revision or reciprocal agreements with foreign countries, your Republican Administration, I warn you to-day, must do something.

The President calls attention in his public addresses to the dangerous growth of monopolies, and the people of this country demand some action. The whole question is interwoven with every other question of our national policy—with the construction of the Panama Canal, as to whether we shall buy our goods in the foreign or domestic markets, in the cheapest or in the dearest markets; with our foreign policy; with the agitation of a system of reciprocity to meet the enactment of retaliatory tariffs by Germany, France, Austria-Hungary, and other European countries; with the trusts, built up and fostered by a high protective tariff; with our policy toward the Philippine Islands and all our island possessions, and with the deficit in our revenues. It has been claimed, Mr. Chairman, that the Republican party is a party of constructive statesmanship and legislation; that the Democratic party is a party of negation. If that be true, gentlemen of the majority, quit raising your cry of "stand pat," because that is the cry of a party of negation. [Applause on the Democratic side.] Do something positive, and do it now, for the whole world is agitating the question of retaliation unless there is some definite action and some revision of the high protective schedules of the Dingley tariff law, the highest ever known in the history of our Government. Revise this law for the protection of the American farmer and the American laborer, and revise this law also for the relief of the American manufacturer, who will soon be excluded from the markets of the world. Such revision is not inconsistent with the protection and safety of all our industries, North and South, and of American labor, and accords with wise statesmanship. In a speech which I made in the Fifty-eighth Congress—the last Congress—upon the subject of reciprocal trade agreements with foreign countries, I made an appeal to Republicans, if they would not give some measure of relief by revision of these high rates of the Dingley tariff law, that they would at least negotiate again and ratify the treaties which were pigeonholed in the United States Senate—the Kasson treaties with France and other countries. These treaties were negotiated with the Danish and British West Indies, with Nicaragua, Ecuador, and France, and they gave the maximum of benefit and the minimum of injury to American interests. Why, you take the French treaty. It proposed only an average of 6.8 per cent reduction of duty on American manufactures, and we got a reduction from France, by means of that treaty, of from 26 to 48 per cent on our exports of $25,000,000 to France. I said on February 4, 1905, in the discussion of the diplomatic and consular bill:

I wish to-day to appeal to Republicans, if they will not give to the people some measure of relief as advocated by some of the Republican party, by means of a proper revision of tariff schedules, that they will at least extend to the American people such relief by means of reciprocity treaties as will open up new markets for the products of our farms and factories, and enable the farmers and manufacturers of the United States to dispose of their surplus products. Unless some such course is pursued by the Republican Administration, and if the exactions of the high rates and schedules of the Dingley tariff law are continued, the effect must be that retaliatory measures will be resorted to by the other nations of the world and we shall lose new and valuable markets for American agricultural products and manufactures.

One hundred years ago Mr. Jefferson declared that the choice was between reciprocity or retaliation, and so to-day if the high rates of the Dingley tariff law be maintained you, gentlemen of the majority, must choose between reciprocity and retaliatory measures by other nations. Sooner or later you must advocate commercial fair play and peace instead of commercial exclusiveness, or you will have commercial war. Jefferson understood this governmental principle; Blaine foresaw it, and President McKinley, who, though dead, still possesses and deserves the respect and confidence of the American people, advocated it.

Mr. Chairman, I was then making in that speech a plea for the South. I was speaking then for the southern farmer and the southern cotton-seed-oil industry, advocating the Kasson treaty with France and other reciprocity treaties. The logic of events has justified what I then said; and again to-day I plead for the sunny South and the southern farmer and cotton-seed-oil industry, which is being destroyed by European tariffs, and for new and wider markets.

I urge you, gentlemen of the majority, to do something in the way of revision of the tariff on reciprocal trade agreements, and substantially benefit the producers, the farmers, and laborers, and the manufacturers of the whole country. As the minority leader, the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS], said the other day upon the floor, "If you will not let us revise the Dingley law, why, then, revise the tariff yourselves." I say to you, if you will not do either, then give us reciprocity. The pendulum has constantly swung from tariff revision to reciprocity, and you will be forced to accept one or the other policy or face commercial war.

I am glad to see the independent voice, which is being raised from Massachusetts and which is being raised from Iowa. I know that the Republican leaders have been inclined to make light of the fact that we are selling our surplus products in the foreign markets cheaper to the foreigner than we are to the American citizen. I know that they are inclined to make light of what Governor Cummins said at the late reciprocity convention in the city of Chicago, and they are inclined to say there is not so much after all in this cry which comes from independent Massachusetts—independent ever since the days of the Revolution, the days of Concord and Lexington and Bunker Hill—and from Iowa.

But I want to say to Republicans upon this floor, that in my honest judgment and opinion the time has come or is coming soon when you will be forced to abandon your policy of negation, your "stand-pat" policy, and assert your constructive statesmanship, and either moderate your high tariff or give the country reciprocal commercial agreements, or commercial war with the whole world is inevitable. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

THE NEW GERMAN AND EUROPEAN TARIFFS, AND EFFECT ON COTTON-SEED OIL INDUSTRY.

Very recently important tariff changes have taken place or are about to take place in the tariff systems of nearly all the continental nations of Europe, which have adopted or have under contemplation the adoption of a high protective tariff against our exports.

Mr. Chairman, I hold in my hand a recent letter which was addressed to the Newbern Cotton Oil Mills, Newbern, N. C. That is my home town, and it is one of the best towns in the United States. [Applause.] In that letter the disastrous effect of the new German tariff upon the great commodity of cotton-seed oil is shown. Do you know what that industry means to the South? Why, from the few hundred thousand dollars investment, this great industry—the cotton-seed oil industry—has been built up, until a few years ago, in 1902, the total value of the product was over $42,000,000. Cotton-seed oil mills are scattered all over the South. They are located in close proximity to the ginneries, and the industry is constantly becoming of more and vital importance to the cotton-growing districts of the South. They afford new avenues of employment to the people and an opportunity for the investment of capital. What was formerly waste material is becoming a mine of wealth to the southern people. We find markets in France, Germany, and Austria-Hungary. The letter to the Newbern Cotton Oil Mills from the Merchants' Association of New York City is as follows:

TO FOSTER THE TRADE AND WELFARE OF NEW YORK.

NEW YORK, July 14, 1905.

NEWBERN COTTON OIL MILLS,
Newbern, N. C.

GENTLEMEN: Important changes have taken or are about to take place in the tariff systems of nearly all the continental nations of Europe which have adopted or have under contemplation the adoption of high protective tariff duties on imports. Besides this very marked increase in tariff duties adopted by European countries, most of these nations have adopted a dual tariff system under which they apply a maximum or general tariff on ordinary imports and minimum, separate, or conventional tariff duties to those nations which make reciprocal concessions in their rates of duty, the difference in the two rates of duty, of the maximum and the minimum tariff, respectively, running from 15 per cent to 75 per cent.

The result of these new tariff systems adopted by the countries of Europe will be most disastrous upon the export trade of the United States. In addition to the high and prohibitive rates of duty imposed upon imports from the United States our products will meet with the severe competition of other nations to whom the minimum tariff rates are conceded.

The very serious situation that confronts the export trade of the United States to Europe will be realized when it is considered that our total exports to Europe during the fiscal year 1904 exceeded the sum of $1,057,000,000, which was more than two-thirds of our total exports. The United Kingdom, which receives more than half of these exports to Europe, under its present tariff system will offer no barriers to our trade unless the agitation conducted by Mr. Chamberlain should be successful. Germany (after the United Kingdom our best customer), which receives $215,000,000 of our exports; France, $65,000,000; Italy, $35,000,000, and Switzerland, Russia, Austria-Hungary, and minor countries of the Continent will bar many of our exports through the imposition of these high rates of duty.

Our principal articles of export to the Continent of Europe are the following: Wheat, rye, oats, barley, corn, wheat flour, malt, potatoes, hops, dried apples, pears, apricots, peaches and prunes, fresh apples, sausages, lard, salted meats, butter, cheese, fresh and canned beef, canned salmon, tobacco, eggs, oleomargarine, wood alcohol, cows and oxen, horses, hogs, cotton, shoes, lumber (rough), sewing machines, leather, electrical machinery, machine tools, telegraph instruments, telephones, electric lighting and power apparatus, railways and street cars, motor cars and motor bicycles, machinery of various kinds, typewriters, naval stores, agricultural implements, petroleum, oils.

All of these articles will be seriously affected by the proposed tariff changes in most of the continental countries.

The new tariff system of the Empire of Germany, which goes into effect during the first half of the year 1906, not only doubles many of the rates of duty upon our chief articles of export, but also by the reciprocal treaties entered into by Germany with a number of European nations will place us at a still greater disadvantage.

The same condition will shortly meet us in Austria-Hungary, where the proposed new tariff is expected shortly to be adopted. As an instance of the disastrous effect of these new high tariff rates of duty upon the exports from the United States, it is sufficient to mention the article of cotton-seed oil, the duty upon which will be quadrupled, which will destroy our cotton-seed oil export trade to that country.

Russia raised her rates of duty on our exports by from 50 per cent to 100 per cent in 1901, in retaliation for the countervailing duty imposed by the United States on Russian sugar, and has now adopted a maximum tariff which increases these retaliatory rates of duty, and which will no doubt entirely check our export trade with that country. Our total exports to Russia in 1904 were $31,200,000, as against imports of $2,200,000.

The Republic of France after the passage of the McKinley Act adopted a high protective maximum tariff and a minimum tariff, with the result that during the last six years our exports to France have shown no increase except in a few limited articles on which France gave the United States reductions in duties in exchange for certain slight reductions granted by the United States under section 3 of the Dingley Act, and it is noteworthy that our exports to France covered by this reciprocal agreement have increased from 1898 to 1903 by 46 per cent.

Italy granted us reductions under her minimum tariff on a limited number of exports with the same result as in the case of France, namely, that our exports of the few articles on which Italy grants us her minimum rates have shown a very large increase, whereas our exports of such articles as are subject to the maximum rates have not increased materially.

In Switzerland, which Republic has always been a good customer of the United States, we shall be subjected to the maximum rates of duty under the new Swiss tariff shortly to be put in force.

The Merchants' Association of New York, after carefully considering the conditions with which our trade is threatened, have adopted the subjoined resolutions, which we commend to your serious consideration.

It appears to us that the time has now come when the United States should adopt a policy of reciprocal trade agreements, in accordance with the last words of ex-President McKinley, for the purpose of preserving and extending our export trade and gaining more outlets for our growing agricultural and manufacturing products.

With this end in view we should seek to establish reciprocal trade relations not only with the countries of Europe, but also with our immediate neighbors on the north and on the south.

The most striking illustration of the benefits that follow the cultivation of better trade relations by reciprocal tariff reductions can be witnessed in the extraordinary growth of our exports to the island of Cuba, which, it is estimated by the Bureau of Statistics of the Department of Commerce and Labor, will, during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1905, reach the total of $38,000,000, showing a very large increase as compared with the previous fiscal year and a much larger increase as compared with the fiscal year immediately antedating the reciprocity convention with Cuba. The fact also is significant that whereas our imports from Cuba have increased 33 per cent our exports to Cuba have gained 80 per cent since reciprocity was adopted.

The business interests of the United States should take prompt and active steps, both collectively through their trade organizations and individually, to impress upon the President of the United States and his advisers the important necessity that exists for the negotiation of reciprocity treaties with our neighbors and our principal customers abroad, and to urge upon Senators and Representatives in Congress that such reciprocity treaties should promptly be ratified, in order to preserve our present trade and enlarge it. When once lost or taken from us it can not be recovered except with great difficulty.

We trust that we may count upon your cooperation in this movement and would ask you to inform The Merchants' Association of New York of any action that you take. We would also ask you to forward copies to us of any letters that you may send to or receive from public officials whom you address on the subject.

Yours, very truly,

COMMITTEE ON RECIPROCITY TREATIES,
THE MERCHANTS' ASSOCIATION OF NEW YORK.
By JOHN C. EAMES, Chairman.

DANIEL P. MORSE,
E. H. OUTERBRIDGE,
Committee on Reciprocity Treaties.

Mr. Chairman, I have another letter here which I am going to put in the RECORD, with the permission of the House. This is a letter from the president of the Chamber of Commerce of New York to the president of the Chamber of Commerce of Newbern, N. C., also calling attention to the effect of the new European tariffs upon our foreign trade. It is as follows:

NEW YORK, N. Y., June 23, 1905.

To the president of the Chamber of Commerce, Newbern, N. C.

DEAR SIR: In pursuance of the inclosed resolutions, adopted by the Chamber of Commerce of the State of New York on the 1st instant, we take liberty of addressing you on behalf of the chamber for the purpose of drawing your attention to the grave dangers that now threaten our foreign trade.

Since the enactment of the McKinley and Dingley tariff laws the nations of continental Europe—France, Germany, Austria, Russia, Italy, Switzerland, Spain, and Portugal—following the example of the United States, have adopted, or are about to adopt, high protective tariff duties on imports into their respective countries, which have the effect, or when adopted will have the effect, of very seriously curtailing, if not in some instances entirely cutting off, our exports to these European countries, some of which have in the past been among our best customers.

The tariff systems adopted by most of these nations of Europe include a maximum or general tariff and a minimum or conventional tariff under which they reduce the rates of duty on many articles by separate treaties or conventions with such nations as offer tariff concessions in exchange, the difference in the two rates of the duty of the maximum and minimum tariff ranging in the case of some nations from 15 to 75 per cent and more.

When these new tariff systems are in full force the effect upon the export trade of the United States will be disastrous, as not only shall we be subjected to the high and, in many cases, prohibitive rates of duty of the maximum or general tariffs, but shall also find the reciprocal reductions made by European nations among each other under their minimum or conventional handicapping our export trade with still greater disadvantage.

During the fiscal year 1904 our total exports to Europe exceeded the sum of $1,057,000,000, more than two-thirds of our total exports. Of these exports the United Kingdom took more than half, or nearly $538,000,000; Germany, our next largest customer, took $215,000,000, or more than one-fifth; then comes France with $85,000,000, Italy with $35,000,000, and the other countries with lesser amounts.

Our trade with the United Kingdom is not threatened at present and will not be unless the agitation conducted by Mr. Chamberlain and his adherents should result in the introduction of a different tariff system in Great Britain than now prevails.

Our trade relations with Germany present the most serious aspect, owing to the magnitude of the interests affected. Under the new general tariff adopted by the German Empire, and going into effect in the year 1906, the duties on our products will be raised as follows, the rates expressed in United States currency:

[Per 100 kilograms, equal to 220.4 pounds.]

On wheat, from 83 cents to $1.78.
On rye, from 83 cents to $1.66.
On oats, from 67 cents to $1.66.
On barley, from 47 cents to $1.66.
On corn, from 38 cents to $1.19.
On flour, from $1.74 to $4.36.
On malt, from 85 cents to $2.44.
On hops, from $3.38 to $6.66.
On dried apples, pears, apricots, and peaches, from 95 cents to $2.38.
Fresh apples, now free, $2.38.
On oranges, from 95 cents to $2.86.
On sausage, from $4.04 to $16.66.
On lard and cotton-seed oil, from $2.38 to $2.97.
On salted meats, from $4.04 to $10.71.
On butter, from $3.80 to $7.14.
On oleomargarine, from $3.80 to $7.14.
On cheese, from $4.76 to $7.14.
On eggs, from 47 cents to $1.42.
On wood alcohol, now free, $4.76.
On cattle, per head, from $2.14 to $4.28.
On horses, per head, from $4.76 to $21.42–$85.68.
On hogs, per head, from $1.19 to $4.28.
On shoes, from $11.90–$15.47 to $20.23–$42.84.
On sewing machines, from $5.71 to $8.33.
On other kinds of machinery the increase in duty amounts to from 50 to 100 per cent.

The importance of our export trade in the articles affected by this great increase in duties is shown by the value of articles exported from the United States to Germany in 1904: Wheat, $6,000,000; lard, $15,600,000; leather and manufactures, $1,200,000; corn, $7,200,000; beef, $600,000; wood and manufactures, $3,600,000; flour, $2,200,000; fruits, $3,600,000.

The conventional tariff adopted by the German Empire and applied to the imports from those countries that grant Germany reciprocal concessions in tariff rates reduces the general tariff rates very materially, on many articles by 75 per cent, and the countries thus favored will be enabled to underbid us in the German markets in all of our articles of export and practically to exclude many of our products.

Our trade with the Republic of France under the present tariff system in operation in that country is most unsatisfactory, handicapped as it is by heavier rates of duty under the maximum tariff of France on many articles on which our competitors receive the benefit of the mimimum tariff rates, and it is not surprising that our total exports to France show practically no increase in the last six years, whereas our exports to Germany in the same period have increased from $155,000,000 in 1898 to $215,000,000 in 1904. On the other hand, our exports to France of the few articles covered by the reciprocal agreement entered into with that country under section 3 of the Dingley Act have increased from 1898 to 1903 by 46 per cent.

Russia, in 1901, in consequence of the countervailing duty imposed by the United States on her bounty-paid sugar, raised her rates of duty on our exports by from 50 to 100 per cent. She has now adopted a maximum tariff, which raises these duties still higher, and will undoubtedly completely destroy our export trade to Russia.

Austria-Hungary now has under contemplation a new maximum and minimum tariff, which it is expected will shortly be adopted by Parliament, and under which our exports to Austria-Hungary will suffer severely. Under this new tariff an increase in the Austrian rate of duty on cotton-seed oil will be made equal to 300 per cent, which will effectually kill our cotton-seed oil exports to Austria-Hungary.

Italy now grants us minimum rates of duty on a limited number of our products, the export of which to that country has greatly grown, while the export of articles subject to her maximum rates has not shown a material increase.

In view of the grave situation that thus confronts us, it appears that the business interests of this country should make their influence felt in favor of the early negotiation and ratification of treaties of reciprocity with our principal European customers through which our trade relations with these countries may be adjusted upon a mutually advantageous basis.

We trust that if you agree with this chamber in their view of the situation and the remedy it calls for we may count upon your earnest cooperation in rousing the business interests of the country to the dangers that threaten our foreign trade.

It is of the utmost importance that the National Government be informed in no uncertain terms of the demand of the business community that our foreign trade be extended and enlarged by improved commercial relations with the countries of Europe so that imminent danger of a disastrous tariff war of retaliation may be avoided, and we should therefore urge you to present your views on this subject to the President of the United States and his advisers and also to the Senators and Congressmen from your State.

It is necessary that this important question, which means either life and growth or practical extinction to a large part of our valuable export trade, should be thoroughly agitated. To this end the prompt, thorough, and effective support of all the commercial organizations of the country is imperatively demanded.

Kindly indicate to us if we may count upon your active cooperation.

Yours, very truly,

COMMITTEE ON FOREIGN COMMERCE AND THE REVENUE LAWS,
By GUSTAV H. SCHWAB.

I will also call to the attention of Congress resolutions adopted by the Chamber of Commerce of the State of New York and the Merchants' Association of New York, also resolutions of the Memphis Merchants' Exchange, as follows:

Resolutions adopted by the Chamber of Commerce of the State of New York June 1, 1905.

Whereas the new customs tariff adopted by the German Empire, and the commercial treaties concluded by that Empire with important European countries, will seriously affect our growing export trade to Germany; and

Whereas our exports of merchandise to Germany have more than doubled in the last ten years, and have reached the sum of $215,000,000 in the year 1904, exceeding in value the exports of any other nation into Germany, and proving that country to be our best customer after the United Kingdom: Therefore, be it

Resolved, That the Chamber of Commerce of the State of New York heartily favor the conclusion of a commercial treaty of reciprocity between the German Empire and the Government of the United States, by which the trade relations between both countries may be adjusted upon a mutually advantageous basis; and be it further

Resolved, That the committee on foreign commerce and the revenue laws be instructed to use all proper means and to exercise every honorable effort to secure the conclusion and ratification of such a treaty of reciprocity between the two countries.

Whereas our export trade to France, Russia, Switzerland, and Austria-Hungary is threatened with material reduction, if not practical extinction, by the adoption of new maximum tariff rates of duty, either now in force or shortly to be adopted by these countries; be it

Resolved, That the Chamber of Commerce of the State of New York advocate the early conclusions of commercial treaties of reciprocity with the countries above mentioned; and be it further

Resolved, That the committee on foreign commerce and the revenue laws be instructed to use every honorable means at the proper time to secure the adoption and ratification of such treaties of reciprocity or commercial treaties.

The following preambles and resolutions were unanimously adopted by the board of directors of the Merchants' Association of New York at their meeting on June 8, 1905:

"Whereas the principal nations of continental Europe, following the example of the United States, have adopted or are about to adopt high tariff rates of duty on many products of the soil and of manufacture, the imposition of which on the products of the United States can not fail to most injuriously affect the welfare of the varied interests of this country; and

"Whereas these European countries have also adopted or have in contemplation a system of preferential tariff rates of duty to be accorded to those nations that are willing to offer similar reciprocal reductions in their rates of duty, which would enable countries so favored to underbid our products in European markets: Now, therefore, be it

"Resolved, That the Merchants' Association of New York heartily favors the conclusion of reciprocal treaties of commerce between the United States and these European countries by which an enlarged trade and extended markets for our products may be secured; and be it further

"Resolved, That a committee of five be appointed by the president, which committee shall urge upon the Government of the United States and upon the Congress of the United States the importance of the adoption of such reciprocity treaties, and shall place itself in communication with all commercial and agricultural associations or bodies throughout the United States for the purpose of soliciting their cooperation in securing the conclusion and ratification of such commercial treaties of reciprocity."

Resolutions adopted by the Memphis Merchants' Exchange at a meeting held June 2, 1905, relative to the proposed prohibitive tariffs upon imports into foreign countries of cotton-seed oil and other American manufactured products.

Whereas the Government of Germany has promulgated a new schedule of tariffs upon imports into that country, to become effective March 1, 1906, under which the rates of duty upon imports from the United States are largely increased; and

Whereas the duty on cotton-seed oil is therein increased from 10 marks per 100 kilograms to 12.50 marks per 100 kilograms, or 25 per cent; and

Whereas the Government of Austria-Hungary has arranged a new schedule of tariffs upon imports into that country, which schedule but awaits the favorable action of the two parliaments of that Government to become effective, under which the rates of duty upon imports from the United States are largely increased; and

Whereas under the proposed new schedule of tariffs in Austria-Hungary the duty on cotton-seed oil will be 40 kronen per 100 kilograms, instead of the present rate of 9.52 kronen per 100 kilograms, an increase of more than 300 per cent—i. e., from 7½ cents to 30 cents per gallon, or fourfold, which duty would be absolutely prohibitory and would result in the destruction of a trade with that country in this commodity which it has taken years to build up, and which now amounts to 75,000 barrels per annum; and

Whereas in France a bill for an injurious, if not destructive, increase of the duty on cotton-seed oil, which has been pending for several years, has been checked by the advocates of reciprocity in that country, but the passage of which has now become imminent; and

Whereas the movements above named are manifestly the beginning of a general tariff war upon American products; and

Whereas the "favored nations" clause in our treaties with foreign nations does not give us the benefit of lower duties in those countries which are the result of reciprocal arrangements with other nations as a consideration therefor, but only guarantees to us the privilege of entering into similar reciprocal arrangements: Therefore, be it

Resolved, That the Merchants' Exchange of the City of Memphis urges upon southern United States Senators and Representatives, upon the southern newspaper press, and upon all commercial and trade organizations throughout the South, earnest efforts to arouse public interest in this subject and to make immediate and concerted efforts for defense against the threatened destruction of a most important southern industry.

I also desire to insert in the RECORD the resolutions adopted on the subject of reciprocity and our foreign trade by the reciprocity convention that held its meeting in Chicago during the past summer and McKinley's wise counsel, as follows:

RECIPROCITY AND OUR FOREIGN TRADE—CONDITIONS NOW CONFRONTING THE EXPORT BUSINESS OF THE UNITED STATES CALL FOR SERIOUS CONSIDERATION AT THE PRESENT TIME—A MEMORIAL TO THE CONGRESS AND THE PEOPLE OF THE UNITED STATES.

In behalf of more than 200 leading American agricultural and commercial organizations participating in the national reciprocity conference held at Chicago, Ill., August 16 and 17 last, and in behalf of many others who have since expressed their sympathy with the aims and objects of that conference, the undersigned, constituting the national committee of the American Reciprocal Tariff League, organized in accordance with resolutions adopted by said national reciprocity conference, respectfully invite attention to the following facts:

When in the year 1897 the Dingley tariff law was enacted by Congress and approved by the President, the business interests of the country generally and the producing interests of the West in particular assumed that practical measures were at last to be taken to protect our foreign trade as well as home markets, that those interests producing a surplus that has to be sold abroad were to receive the same consideration from the Government that had been so generously extended for so many years to industries whose output is consumed at home. Sections 3 and 4 of this law provided for the establishment of reciprocal trade relations with such nations as would concede valuable trading privileges to ourselves. The law was supposedly designed to open the way to a comprehensive scheme of international reciprocity. The President was authorized to negotiate commercial treaties with foreign powers upon the basis of mutual concessions, the schedules being purposely set high enough to afford protection to home industries even where the full 20 per cent reduction authorized by the law might be conceded. Under this provision President McKinley concluded no less than twelve different treaties, the fate of which is well known. Requiring ratification by a two-thirds vote of the Senate, they were deliberately "held up" until the time limit fixed by the law itself had been exhausted. In this way a rigid maximum range of duties, amounting in some cases to downright exclusion, was established, the continued application of which now threatens to materially affect our European balances.

This condition, it will be observed, arises not by virtue of the deliberate intent of the framers of the Dingley law, for they made every provision for quite a different policy. It does not exist by virtue of any failure on the part of the Executive, because President McKinley and his successor undertook to give full force and effect to what they knew to be the desire of the masses of the people and of the majority of those who in Congress had voted for the bill, believing that section 4 was to be honestly and promptly administered. As enacted it possessed the vital element of elasticity so essential in dealing with the several governments now operating under the dual tariff plan; but as emasculated it is fairly forcing some of our best customers to retaliate against us. It is time, therefore, that we consider carefully the question of how we are to meet the difficulties now rapidly coming into view.

THE RECIPROCITY CONFERENCE RESOLUTIONS.

That the duties thus fastened upon the country by indirection are sooner or later to lead us into serious trouble is the firm belief of those whom we represent. The nullification of section 4 not only defeated the intent of a majority of those who voted for the existing law, but is building up monopolies at the expense of important interests now seriously menaced and is rapidly leading up to trade complications threatening the continued prosperity of our people. Hence the demand of the business interests represented at the late Chicago convention as voiced in the following declarations:

Whereas the agriculture, manufactures, and other industries of this country have expanded to such an extent that they can no longer depend upon the home market for the consumption of their entire product; and

Whereas the export trade has become a vital support to many of our industries; and

Whereas the present commercial attitude of the United States, largely owing to our failure to carry into effect the reciprocal trade provisions of section 4 of the Dingley law, is antagonizing foreign nations, whose good will we desire, and on whom we have hitherto depended as purchasers of our surplus products: Therefore, be it

Resolved, First, that this convention, recognizing the principle of protection as the established policy of our country, advocates reciprocal concessions by means of a dual or maximum and minimum tariff as the only practical method of relieving at this time the strained situation with which we are now confronted.

Second, that eventually the question of the schedules and items to be considered in reciprocal concessions preferably be suggested by a permanent tariff commission, to be created by Congress and appointed by the President, which shall consist of economic, industrial, and commercial experts.

Third, that it is the sense of this convention that our present tariff affords abundant opportunity for such concessions without injury to industry, trade, or the wages of labor.

M'KINLEY'S SANE COUNSEL.

"Our capacity to produce has developed so enormously and our products have so multiplied that the problem of more markets requires our urgent and immediate attention. Only a broad and enlightened policy will keep what we have. No other policy will get more. In these times of marvelous business energy and gain we ought to be looking to the future, strengthening the weak places in our industrial and commercial systems, that we may be ready for any storm or strain.

"By sensible trade arrangements which will not interrupt our home production we shall extend the outlets for our increasing surplus. A system which provides a mutual exchange of commodities is manifestly essential to the continued and healthful growth of our export trade. We must not repose in fancied security that we can forever sell everything and buy little or nothing. If such a thing were possible, it would not be best for us or for those with whom we deal. We should take from our customers such of their products as we can use without harm to our industries and labor. Reciprocity is the natural outgrowth of our wonderful industrial development under the domestic policy now firmly established. What we produce beyond our domestic consumption must have a vent abroad. The excess must be relieved through a foreign outlet, and we should sell everywhere we can and buy wherever the buying will enlarge our sales and productions, and thereby make a greater demand for home labor.

"The period of exclusiveness is past. The expansion of our trade and commerce is the pressing problem. Commercial wars are unprofitable. A policy of good will and friendly trade relations will prevent reprisals. Reciprocity treaties are in harmony with the spirit of the times; measures of retaliation are not. If perchance some of our tariffs are no longer needed for revenue or to encourage and protect our industries at home, why should they not be employed to extend and promote our markets abroad?"

In addition to these letters, resolutions, and memorial I call to the attention of the House the appeal addressed to the Members of Congress by the National German-American Alliance, as follows:

National German-American Alliance of the United States of America to the Members of Congress of the United States:

Believing that the conclusion of a commercial treaty on lines of reciprocity between the United States of America and the Empire of Germany would be a great advantage to the commercial interests of this country and that such a treaty would tend to strengthen the bonds of good feeling between the two countries, and, further, believing that the present time is eminently auspicious for the conclusion of such an agreement that may be just and fair to both parties, we hereby respectfully petition your honorable body in behalf of such legislation now before you or that may be introduced hereafter in favor of a reciprocity treaty between the United States of America and the Empire of Germany.

A revision of the tariff conditions between the United States and Germany on a broader, firmer, and above all a juster basis has for a long time been the desire of the American and German business world and is now urgently demanded. Business men know that in mercantile and industrial circles a deep-seated bad feeling prevails in consequence of the experiences arising out of the present unbearable conditions. The following facts very clearly show how well founded this feeling of dissatisfaction is:

On the total imports, including dutiable and free goods, the collections in the United States amount on the average to 27 per cent; in Germany, only to 9 per cent; in other words, the tariff wall inclosing America is three times as high as that inclosing Germany.

Those goods which enter Germany free from the United States amount to 540,000,000 marks. That is more than half and almost two-thirds of the total imports from America.

On the other hand, the greater majority of goods imported from Germany to America pay on an average 50 per cent and even more. In the case of woolen goods, which are an important German export, the American tariff hovers about the 100 per cent mark, while in individual cases far higher figures are reached. For example, in the case of blankets, 142 per cent; cloths, 150 per cent, and in the case of woven goods, 168 per cent. Some few rates, especially those on machines, are absolutely prohibitive and kill any and every competition.

The so-called "sliding-scale" tariffs have become a special source of annoyance and dissatisfaction where the rate for certain goods is calculated from a series of various factors. In the application of this tariff rate the American custom-house officials have displayed such arbitrary action that the rate could not be determined even approximately in advance, and the importer found himself practically at the mercy of the officials. No one will have the temerity to assert that such an uncertainty encourages business.

Such profits as arise from these conditions do not accure, however, to the American people, but to the trusts, into whose lap this tariff arrangement has already poured millions; for by it they save themselves from all competition in their own country, and can force prices from their own countrymen 25 to 50 per cent higher than those which they gratefully accept for the same goods abroad.

The opponents of a reciprocity agreement maintain that Germany's dissatisfaction need not be considered at all; even if the German tariff should be raised, it would not lessen the sale of American goods in Germany, since Germany is forced to buy in the United States. But this is a serious error. While the German exports to America amounted to 469,000,000 marks in 1903, the United States exported during the same year to the extent of 935,000,000 marks to Germany, made up chiefly of raw materials such as cotton. A German high tariff after the American manner would close to the United States a territory to which they have been sending goods to the amount of more than 900,000,000 marks. Where will they find another market for these? The German goods shipped to America are, on the other hand, almost exclusively manufactured articles; and these exports have risen during the last five years from 333,000,000 to 469,000,000 marks, in spite of the fact that the American tariff screws have been put on tighter and tighter—which proves that America finds it profitable to import these goods from Germany.

To how great an extent American trade would be injured by the failure to conclude a treaty is evident from the voices heard from the shoe industry of Massachusetts. They have learned that the new general tariff, which goes into force in Germany next March, places a two to three times higher duty on shoe goods, and they realize that they will no longer be able to compete with the German home manufacturers. One of them sounds this warning note: "If we do not conclude a reciprocity treaty with Germany our shoe trade with that country will be ruined." Another admits: "Reciprocity alone can save us. We can no more blame the Germans than the Canadians if they raise their tariff against us."

Germany has in its outline of a commercial treaty considerable advantages to offer the United States; but then it has, of course, a right to count on an equivalent return.

President Roosevelt has expressed himself in favor of such a treaty, and Ambassador Tower has said in Berlin that he considers the time very auspicious and entertains the hope that an agreement which may be just and fair to both parties may be reached. The spokesmen of a commercial treaty may therefore refer to these two men in case anyone should accuse them of a lack of patriotism.

By order of the national executive committee.

Respectfully submitted.

C. J. HEXAMER, President.

PHILADELPHIA, January, 1906.

THE PEOPLE DEMAND SOME ACTION—EXCLUSION MEANS RETALIATION.

Coming from associations of this character, are these letters and resolutions entitled to proper consideration or are they not? Shall they be ignored? Will you decline to heed them? Shall the "stand-pat" policy still prevail and other questions sidetrack the consideration of this great issue before the American people? Once before in the history of our country, before we had achieved our independence, when actual war and not commercial warfare confronted us, the emissaries of King George cried peace when there was no peace, and the politicians lulled the people into fancied security until Virginia's great orator, Patrick Henry, aroused patriots to the duty of the hour and the fact that peace was no longer possible. I would that I had the gifted tongue of Henry to ring it into your ears, gentlemen of the Republican party, that the "stand-pat" policy is no longer possible. Your tariff schedules can no longer be made a fetich to be worshiped and idolized as sacred. With the growth and expansion of our country, our trade, our territory, new avenues of trade must be provided and wider markets. Private extortion must yield to public right. The demand comes from the manufacturers as well as the farmers and laborers, from the sellers and producers as well as the buyers and consumers. With our growth as a world power the oceans which wash the shores of our Republic invite us to enjoy foreign trade. Every ripple upon our shores and every ship which sails the seas invites us to share the wealth of foreign nations. If you restore by any method the ocean-carrying trade of our ships and still maintain without a single breach your high protective tariff walls of exclusion, where, I pray you, will you ship your surplus products which can not now be consumed at home? Will you continue your export price lists and sell cheaper to the foreigner than to the American citizen? Such a policy is immeasurably unjust and discreditable to any school of statesmanship. Should the Chamberlain policy prevail in Great Britain (preferential tariffs between the colonies and mother country, and protection against the rest of the world) excluding us from one of our largest markets, and the retaliatory measures of Germany and other countries be enforced, business stagnation would be inevitable and ruin stare us in the face. Except Great Britain, the whole world is closing its doors against us. While we are sympathizing with the open-door policy and wrestling with the problem of extending our trade in China, Japan, and the Orient, we are by a false economic policy closing the doors of all continental Europe to our trade; a false policy, a disastrous policy, to benefit a few manufacturers who already reap enormous and extortionate profits. Lower your high tariff walls either by revision or trade agreements and you would increase your revenue and enjoy a foreign trade beyond your dreams.

Do you propose to continue a policy so grossly inconsistent, so grievously unjust to the people of the United States, which compels you to pay for the supplies for the construction of your Panama Canal in the home market more than the same class of goods can be purchased in the open market of the world where competition exists? Will you continue to pay a bounty to manufacturers already so rich that they are unable to count their millions, and arraying against themselves the spirit of socialism and communism? What are you going to do about this Panama business, anyhow? The canal must be built. There is a deficit in the Treasury. Do you propose to lavish the people's money upon a few manufacturers, or buy where it can be done most economically to all our citizens and taxpayers? Will you squander the money of the people to benefit a few at the expense of the whole country? The Panama Canal is the great gateway of commerce between the Atlantic and Pacific, the highway of nations, and its speedy construction is of incalculable importance to every portion of the country, and especially to the people of the Gulf and South Atlantic coasts. It will build up seaports and coaling stations, and it will benefit the shipping of the world. It should be built in the most judicious and economical way. One of the best votes I ever cast in Congress was for this canal, and I want to see nothing retard its progress. But the expenditures will be enormous, and I am not in favor of making it another medium of favoring and fostering a few favored manufacturers and protected interests. Raise your revenues by lowering your prohibitory tariff, and build your canal by your revenues and not by bond issues. But if you will "stand pat" on the existing schedules, if you will buy in the dearest market upon the pretext of aiding American manufacturers, how long will this hothouse system of protection maintain your trade with the world? Retaliation, as I have outlined, has already begun. If we trade only with ourselves other nations will not trade with us. Something must be done to meet the retaliatory measures of Germany, Austria, France, Russia, and other countries. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

THE NEW GERMAN TARIFF.

The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR] said the other day that Germany would be forced to buy from us. Now, Mr. Chairman, that is not correct, because, as the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] showed in this debate, the Argentine Republic is a great cattle country, and can furnish all the meat and foodstuffs required by Germany. He read a magazine article, from which I quote:

The Argentine Republic, as it is commonly called, is to-day one of the most prosperous and progressive countries. Its foreign commerce for 1904 reached the immense total of $451,463,000 in gold. This was greater than that of any other Latin nation, not excepting Mexico and Brazil. It exceeded the foreign trade of Japan, of whose marvelous progress we now hear so much, and it went far beyond that of China, concerning which there is general discussion. In other words, Argentina, with only 5,000,000 people, showed a buying and selling capacity in excess of Japan with 40,000,000 people and China with 400,000,000! My comparison is no reflection on these latter countries, and I have always been an earnest advocate of the importance of our commercial and political interests in the Far East, but these should not overshadow or hide what we have at stake in South America.

That Argentina is moving ahead with proverbial leaps and bounds is proved by the fact that her foreign commerce, the best thermometer of a country's prosperity, increased $90,000,000 in 1904 over the total for 1903, which was $360,000,000. Estimating her population, as before stated, at 5,000,000, she has in the present total of $451,463,000 the remarkable average of nearly $90 per head, or a far greater average than the United States or any of the principal European countries.

Argentina boasts of splendid railroad facilities. It has now nearly 20,000 miles of trunk lines. Numerous new roads, branch routes, and feeders are being constructed or planned.

* * * * * * *

The transcontinental trains that convey travelers across the broad pampas and climb the Andes to connect with the road on the Chilean side are solid and vestibuled, with up-to-date dining cars. The tourist or business man can now go from Buenos Ayres, on the Atlantic, to Santiago in Chile and Valparaiso, on the Pacific, in seventy-two hours.

* * * * * * *

In conclusion, I wish to epitomize some of the foregoing facts to be remembered by the passing reader: Argentina is as large as half of the United States proper, and covers 1,200,000 square miles; it has a growing population of only 5,000,000, but an annual foreign trade of $450,000,000, or $90 per head.

The effect of the new German tariff is especially detrimental to the agricultural interests of the United States as well as our manufacturing interests.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. THOMAS of North Carolina. Mr. Chairman, I would like to have a little more time in order to conclude my remarks. I will not trespass very long upon the House.

Mr. McCLEARY of Minnesota. How much time does the gentleman wish?

Mr. THOMAS of North Carolina. About ten minutes.

Mr. McCLEARY of Minnesota. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may proceed for ten minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Minnesota asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from North Carolina may proceed for ten minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. THOMAS of North Carolina. I thank the gentleman and the House.

This new German tariff was enacted, according to an excellent article which I have here in the North American Review, written by N. I. Stone, the tariff expert of the Bureau of Statistics, in the interest of the agrarian or agricultural classes of Germany, and therefore it strikes the hardest blow at the American farmer. Mr. Stone says:

THE NEW GERMAN CUSTOMS TARIFF.

In no country of Western Europe does the landed aristocracy retain its political power and influence to the extent it does in Germany, and especially in Prussia. At the court it practically has no rival; all the positions of command and honor in the army are in its grasp; all that is most influential and desirable in the bureaucratic machine of the Prussian Kingdom and the German Empire is in its undisputed possession. Having the ear of the Emperor, whose direct influence on legislation is greater than that of any other constitutional monarch in the world, skilfully and persistently fanning the agitation among the rural population of the country, which has a representation in the German Reichstag out of proportion to its numerical strength, and using all its social and political advantages, the German aristocracy was able to bring the Government around to its point of view, and make the question of protection of the agrarian interests the paramount object of the Government's solicitude in framing the new tariff.

Bearing in mind these facts, it will be easy to follow out the important changes through the elaborate network of the new German tariff. There is not an article of any importance in the agricultural list that can be produced at home the duty on which has not been raised. The duty on wheat, for instance, has been raised from 3.50 marks per 100 kilos in the present conventional tariff to 7.50 marks in the new autonomous tariff, or more than 114 per cent; on corn from 1.60 to 5 marks, or 212 per cent; on flour from 7.30 to 17.75 marks, or 156 per cent; on bacon, from 20 to 36 marks, or 80 per cent; on lard from 10 to 12.50 marks, or 25 per cent; on hops, from 14 to 70 marks, or 400 per cent. Several products formerly on the free list have now been made dutiable; thus, potatoes, formerly admitted free, will now be subject to a duty of 2.50 marks per 100 kilos; other vegetables, like tomatoes, asparagus, mushrooms, melons, etc., also formerly admitted free, are put under a duty of 20 marks per 100 kilos, when imported in a fresh state, and 40 marks if dried or otherwise prepared; several varieties of flowers, plants, and fruit have met with a similar fate.

In the case of manufactures, owing to the radical changes in the classification adopted in the new tariff, no such exact comparison of old and new rates can be made. One thing, however, becomes apparent at a glance, and that is the absence of such sweeping changes in a uniformly upward direction as are found in the agricultural schedules. A number of rates have been advanced, especially those affecting articles in which the United States has recently begun to compete in European markets, such as boots and shoes, certain kinds of machinery, especially of the light-weight varieties, hardware, tools, motors, bicycles, sewing machines, typewriters, etc. The agrarian protectionists were only too glad to grant higher rates to the manufacturers, in order to get the support of the powerful industrial syndicates for their own measures. But, unlike the rates in the agricultural schedules, side by side with increases there are also reductions, while a very large number of rates remain unchanged. This is not surprising, since increased protection to manufactured products did not furnish the motive for tariff revision. Confident of their ability to hold the home market, the manufacturers were not so much after increased rates of import duty as after more favorable rates in foreign markets on German manufactures.

Then I call the attention of gentlemen who come from the West to the fact that the new German tariff will also affect your trade in meats exported to Germany. I ask the Clerk to read this article.

The Clerk read as follows:

PACKERS WOULD ELUDE GERMAN TARIFF WAR—SWIFT & CO. MAY SHIP THEIR MEATS FROM SOUTH AMERICA.

The tariff question has taken on one new phase, as a result of announcement made by officers of Swift & Co., the greatest packing concern in the country, that they are planning to protect their great export trade in meats by establishing a great packing and stock-yard business in Argentina.

Germany's market has been one of the most important in which American meat producers have entered, but if the German plan for increasing tariffs on American foodstuffs is carried into effect it is calculated that this market will be almost closed to this country. In order to secure entrance on fair terms the American packers need only move their business to some country against which Germany does not discriminate. Argentina is such a country. Not only does Germany attempt no discrimination there, but in line with the German policy of encouraging the greatest expansion of trade with South America, much has been conceded to Argentine producers in German markets. Therefore, Argentina is a most promising field for exploitation in this regard.

Mr. THOMAS of North Carolina. Now, Mr. Chairman, that is in line with what I was saying, that the effect of the new German tariff is not only to exclude our agricultural products, but to exclude also our meats from the German market. Why is it, Mr. Chairman, that the gentlemen of the majority will persist in this policy of exclusion with this condition of affairs confronting them in the whole world? Why, I am told that a few special interests, such as the cheap brass jewelry manufacturing interests of New England, held up the Kasson treaty with France in the Senate of the United States, and along with that treaty pigeonholed all the other treaties which, in my judgment, were and are advantageous to the people of the whole country. The result of it all is that our manufacturers and farmers find themselves on the verge of a commercial war.

RECIPROCITY MAY AVOID COMMERCIAL WAR.

Is our foreign trade, now one and one-half billions of dollars annually, of no value? Is it not worth protecting and promoting? Will you sit idly by and do nothing while the nations are excluding you from their markets? Have you forgotten that William McKinley said: "The period of exclusiveness has passed; the expansion of our trade and commerce is the pressing problem?" Have you forgotten that one hundred years ago Mr. Jefferson declared that the choice was between reciprocity or retaliation? What is reciprocity? It is fair trade, recognizing all those nations which buy liberally of us, and who thus become our commercial allies, and make their prosperity our own. The main difficulty in the way of reciprocity advocated by the most enlightened of statesmen of both political parties is this same spirit of selfishness outlined in the "stand-pat" policy. If the stand-pat policy is not modified or moderated, firmly intrenched as the Republican party seems now, I believe the American people will hurl that party from power. [Applause on the Democratic side.] The agitation has already begun. It is heard throughout the land, and it is not confined to the reciprocity convention at Chicago and to Governor Cummins's speeches, but the Merchants' Association of New York, the commercial metropolis of the country, the Chamber of Commerce of New York, and commercial bodies everywhere are crying for some relief. We must prevent the retaliation of Germany and France and Austria and Russia. We must have new and wider markets or business stagnation. The people demand some relief, and they demand it at this time. True reciprocity does not consist in noncompeting products alone. That seems to me senseless. There must be give and take and concessions upon both sides. Reciprocity is a common meeting ground upon which men of all parties can stand. It is certainly Democratic doctrine, however, for Jefferson advocated it. Blaine saw its wisdom. McKinley, who was elected President upon the issue of protection, boldly, eloquently, and earnestly proclaimed it. But whatever the origin of reciprocity, patriotism, the restoration of our trade, counteracting the retaliatory measures of other countries, the expansion of our commerce, and broad statesmanship, which is above party lines and selfish interests, demands in clarion tones some measure which is essentially different from the narrow, sordid, selfish one of maintaining the Chinese walls of exclusion around our borders. [Applause.]

The Atlantic washes our eastern shores; the Pacific our western coast; the Panama Canal, freighted with the commerce of the world, is upon the south and Canada to the north of us, rich with the wealth which we should share in common with other nations, and all our best interests are against a policy of exclusion. The wonderful growth of the whole country, the magnificent cotton belts of the South, the waving fields of grain in the West, the smoking furnaces and factories in the North, and the whirring spindles of New England all demand new and wider markets.

THE NEW SOUTH.

In the South especially has wonderful progress been manifested since the civil war. During the past year there was a gathering at Appomattox of the prosperous citizens of the new South, celebrating the fortieth anniversary of the close of the civil war. And what a wonderful change has come over the spirit of the South since that disastrous day at Appomattox, when the ragged heroes who had charged with Pettigrew and marched with Jackson stacked their arms in front of their exultant foemen and surrendered with their great commander. All in the shape of property was lost by the South as the result of the war. On their homeward way the Confederates marched through a desert; fair cities like Columbia and Atlanta had been licked up by the flaming tongue of war; great industries and transportation systems had been ruined, and plantations had been allowed to grow up in weeds. Three billions of property had been destroyed, and these men, without money, and oftentimes with one arm, were compelled to begin life over again. But in one generation the dauntless gray veterans have turned the old battlefields into smiling farms. Stately cities now rear their spires where once stood the red redoubts of war, and the busy hum of peaceful industry is now heard where once rang the clash of steel and the wild shouts of charging regiments. The rising South to-day greets the world and points with honest pride at the result of her work. No trace of desolation or defeat remains. Prosperity has taken the place of poverty, new cities and towns surprise the traveler everywhere; progress is written all over the map; with the monopoly in cotton, supremacy in iron and coal and timber to supply the Republic in future, the South once again occupies a commanding position in the nation. Diversified crops and great manufacturing industries have wrought a revolution. Outside capital is rushing in; the world has its eyes turned toward "Dixie." The great world's supply of cotton and iron, coal and timber, and marble and granite must come from our fields and mountains, and the world's great factories must do their work in our midst.

In His own good time and in His mysterious way, through the storm of battle and the humiliation of poverty and defeat, the Almighty has led the South at last out of darkness into the light and showered His blessings upon her. The South's story of progress is indeed a marvelous one. I quote the words of the Baltimore Manufacturers' Record: "Two large volumes have already been written, one before and one since the civil war. Their sequel is only beginning. It promises to be full of still greater interest and profit." I have not time to give the statistics as to the growth of this section of our common country. I have not time to eulogize the spirit of the South which has thus risen phenix-like from the ashes of war. Nothing in the history of nations has ever equaled the magnificent recuperation of the South from the devastation of the days of '61 to '65. [Loud applause.]

The following article shows the progress of the South in cotton manufactures:

THE SOUTH AND ITS COTTON.

"Her inevitable prosperity can hardly be exaggerated by predictions." This sentence is another pregnant utterance of the Washington Post. The opening paragraph of the same editorial is even stronger, since the progeny has been, and the world onlooking knows and recognizes à plain and cold fact robbed of all its frills: "In the last three years 483 cotton mills have been erected, and of this number 405 have been constructed south of Mason and Dixon's line."

The entire comment from the Post follows:

"In the last three years 483 cotton mills have been erected, and of this number 405 have been constructed south of Mason and Dixon's line. This has much to do with the marked changes in the conditions connected with the manufacture of cotton goods, a change which was the chief topic of discussion at the recent meeting of the New England Cotton Manufacturers' Association at Atlantic City. Members of the association discussed at great length the necessity of action looking to the enlargement of the market for the product of the American mills and frankly exchanged figures and experiences showing that the mills of the South have led in the progress of manufacturing in the last few years and have made it necessary for the New England mills to look to the foreign fields for their products. The concession is a remarkable tribute to the spirit of the new South, which is no longer content to plant and pick cotton, but now raises, markets, and manufactures cotton. The northern spinners for many years had all they could do to supply the demands of the home market, but now the South, with its materials at the doors of the mills; with its coal fields, timber forests, and magnificent streams furnishing a cheap and never-failing supply of fuel, water, and power; with its cheap labor, owing to the cheaper cost of living; with all the natural and artificial advantages that may be profitably employed in the manufacture of the home-grown crop, is finding a welcome in the home markets and forcing the New England mills to scan foreign fields for an outlet for their surplus. That they have been successful in this search is shown by the fact that exports of cotton manufactures for the year ended last June were in excess of $50,000,000, an increase of 300 per cent in ten years.

PLEA FOR THE SOUTHERN FARMER.

And now one, at least, of the industries in this great section of our country, which has so manfully wrought its salvation and prosperity, is threatened by your high protective tariff with almost total annihilation. For years we have been struggling to build up a great cotton-seed oil industry, and from an investment of a few hundred thousand dollars this industry has invested in it many millions. The failure of the Republican party to give us some relief by adopting, at least, reciprocity treaties with France and Germany and Austria, is destroying this great industry.

The following article from the Washington Post suggests the facts in regard to the Kasson treaty with France:

During the last fiscal year the United States exported, in round numbers, merchandise to the value of $1,500,000,000. Of this stupendous sum the South, with less than a third of the population and less than a tenth of the wealth of the country, supplied merchandise to the value of $614,000,000, or more than 40 per cent of our entire exports. Cotton, in the raw state, was exported to the value of $379,965,014. This represented more than one-half the entire cotton crop.

The late President McKinley appointed Mr. John A. Kasson, an accomplished diplomat, one of the ablest thinkers upon the subject of political economy in the country, and a protectionist of the most consistent record, to negotiate certain reciprocity treaties with foreign states. Mr. Kasson negotiated a treaty with France that would have been of immense advantage to the South, more than doubling her exports of cotton-seed oil, as it would, and helping to swell the right side of the "balance of trade" by at least $20,000,000; but it seems that France, under the new arrangement, would have been permitted to send us cotton stockings at a lower rate than is nominated in the Dingley schedules, and somebody who is making cotton stockings in New England ordered the knife put to the throat of this Kasson treaty, and its throat was accordingly and promptly cut.

Thus, in order to afford New Engand opportunity to make an additional $100,000 or so on cotton stockings the foreign market for cotton-seed oil is curtailed $20,000,000 per annum. The Republican party was never in favor of reciprocity after an election, however vociferously it yelled for it before the vote was cast.

In the early days of the Republic the history of tariff legislation was the history of sectional struggle. The North was jealous of the South, and especially of her great agricultural interests. The North fostered and promoted manufactures. This sectional war was bitter, with some compromises, and sectional legislation was the result. But I plead to-day, with this magnificent record of the South before me, for a broader spirit of patriotism, for the obliteration of this sectional spirit, and in behalf of the southern farmer and manufacturer I beg that you will not destroy one of the great industries of our country. All sections of our country are now identified in interest. The South keeps step with the North and West to the music of the Union.

Let us alone with the solution of the race problem and we will heartily cooperate with you in everything looking to the prosperity of the whole country, and keep steadily in view its honor and welfare. You can by a single stroke of the pen, a single act of administrative policy, put millions in the pockets of our farmers and restore that great industry of our section which is now languishing—the cotton-seed oil industry—by the ratification of reciprocity treaties with France, Germany, and Austria.

If you want to help us build up the South, and if you are not a sectional party, give us such legislation by treaty or act of Congress. Some revision of the tariff, either by act of Congress or reciprocity, will help counteract the drift toward monopoly and toward socialism. It will prevent a glut in the home market and build up commerce on land and sea and increase our revenues. Continue your policy of exclusion and favoritism and class legislation and it will inevitably bring upon you disaster and defeat. [Applause.]

The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. LAWRENCE] the other day, in the House, used the following language in his speech in regard to proper tariff revision:

Having the power, we should not hesitate to use it. Let us give to this subject honest and fearless consideration. When such consideration discloses the fact that a duty is no longer needed let us remove it. This is simple justice. It will benefit all the people and will, I believe, be responsive to the commercial needs of the country.

If you will not revise in a proper and just manner the tariff schedules, at least increase the powers of the Secretary of State under section 3 of the Dingley law with reference to reciprocity and trade agreements, or reenact section 4 of the Dingley tariff law making provision for the negotiation of reciprocity treaties.

The bill looking to this end has been introduced in the House by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. GILBERT]. His bill is as follows:

A bill (H. R. 10848) authorizing the President to negotiate commercial treaties with foreign countries.

Be it enacted, etc., That whenever the President of the United States, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, with a view to secure reciprocal trade with foreign countries, shall enter into commercial treaty or treaties with any other country or countries concerning the admission into any such country or countries of the goods, wares, and merchandise of the United States, and their use and disposition therein deemed to be for the interests of the United States, and any such treaty or treaties in consideration of the advantages accruing to the United States therefrom shall provide for the reduction during a specified period, not exceeding five years, of the duties imposed by the act entitled "An act to provide revenue for the Government and to encourage the industries of the United States," approved July 24, 1897, to the extent of not more than 20 per cent thereof upon such goods, wares, or merchandise as may be designated therein of the country or countries with which such treaty or treaties shall be made as in this act provided for; or shall provide for the transfer during such period from the dutiable list of said act approved July 24, 1897, to the free list thereof, of such goods, wares, and merchandise being the natural products of such foreign country or countries and not of the United States; or shall provide for the retention upon the free list of said act approved July 24, 1897, during a specified period not exceeding five years, of such goods, wares, and merchandise now included in said free list as may be designated therein; and when any such treaty shall have been duly ratified by the Senate and approved by Congress, and public proclamation made accordingly, then and thereafter the duties which shall be collected by the United States upon any of the designated goods, wares, and merchandise from the foreign country in which such treaty has been made, shall, during the period provided for, be the duties specified and provided for in said treaty, and none other.

SEC. 2. That this act shall take effect on and after its passage.

To increase the rates of the Dingley tariff law for the purpose of retaliation means commercial war. It is certain that something must be done, and if so, I ask, when is the best time to do it? Is it when the sun is shining and everything is clear, or shall we wait until the clouds gather and the rains begin to descend and then attempt to build an ark of refuge? There were men who laughed at Noah and said it was not going to be much of a shower anyway. Then there is another famous gentleman who lived in Arkansas and he would not mend his roof when the weather was clear and bright because it did not need it, and he could not do it when it rained. Will you imitate that class of people or will you with business sagacity take the steps necessary to build up our nation with other nations and give the business men of the South and of the whole country new and wider markets? [Loud applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. LOUD] is recognized for forty-five minutes.

Mr. LOUD. Mr. Chairman, thirty years ago in the district which I have the honor to represent the lumber business was the paramount industry. Although agriculture was gaining a foothold and the country rapidly settling up, it was known as a lumber country. Pine was king. In those days the great majority of lumbermen had invested every dollar of his own and every dollar he could borrow in pine stumpage, sawmills, and logs and lumber in conversion and in transit. And connected with most of our large sawmills were great salt blocks, evaporating from three to five hundred barrels of salt each with the refuse fuel from the mills. About this time the lumber production exceeded the consumption and market demands, and a period of stagnation and business depression came on. With notes to meet and current expenses to maintain, the majority of us were in trouble. By a freak of good fortune, however, with our docks full of lumber, which we were unable to sell even at losing prices, the price of salt went up until we obtained $1.25 and $1.50 a barrel for the salt which cost us from 40 cents to 50 cents per barrel to manufacture. With the memory of those days of trouble a couplet, published in the Michigan Lumberman, seemed especially pat and has always remained in my memory:

I am a back-bone lumberman,
Michigan is my nation,
Saginaw is my dwelling place,
And salt is my salvation.

[Laughter.]

Twenty years later, the pine forests gone, the lumber industry practically at an end in this part of the State, the lumbermen who did not seek pastures new in other parts of the United States where timber was still to be found and whose homes and interests bound them to this section of the country, sought for other lines of business.

At this time, ten years ago, investigation proved that sugar beets could be profitably raised from our soil and in our climate, and many of the lumbermen considered seriously embarking in the manufacture of beet sugar as the only available line of business in that section. It was not salt now, but sugar which was their salvation. In this promise of a new business they were encouraged by the plank in the St. Louis platform of the Republican party in 1896. The encouragement promised in this plank was definite and plain:

We condemn the present Administration for not keeping faith with the sugar producers of this country. The Republican party favors such protection as will lead to the production on American soil of all the sugar which the American people use and for which they pay other countries more than $100,000,000 annually.

In quick indorsement of this plank in the party platform the Republican party in the Dingley bill placed a protective duty upon sugar. Believing the Republican party meant what they said and believing in the faith and honor of the Republican party to keep inviolate the pledge so fully made, our capital and our business energies were combined and encouraged to push forward in this new industry and with a determination to bring it to a success, and so fulfill in part, or in whole, so far as they might, the hope expressed in our party platform. In less than ten years twenty magnificent factories have been built in Michigan, five of them in my own district. Of these twenty factories, sixteen have been successful, three of them in my largest county. In these sixteen factories in our State $10,000,000 are invested. A good deal has been said about the sugar trust having bought the controlling interest in these factories, and I wish to say here that that is not true. Of the sixteen factories, there are nine costing $6,000,000, in which the trust has no interest whatever. In the other seven, costing $4,000,000, the trust has about one-half interest. So that out of the $10,000,000 invested in the sixteen factories the trust has an interest of $2,000,000, or 20 per cent of the whole.

If you ask why the sugar trust invested money in these factories, I will say that it is my opinion that they bought interest in these factories to stifle the opposition of the beet-sugar men who owned them against the passage of the Cuban reciprocity treaty, and you gave the sugar trust both the motive and the means. The motive, the stifling of opposition to the measure, and the means to buy them out, for the money which they invested was a small part of the benefit which the sugar trust have obtained and will obtain from that measure.

By that measure, under a sentimental excuse of carrying out a vague, almost imaginary plea of duty to Cuba, you forgot or disregarded your concise pledge to our own people and sought to encourage a greater production and importation of sugar grown upon the richest soil and by cheap labor as against the welfare and interest of our own American farmers raising sugar beets and the manufacturers whose capital was invested in this new industry. But this is ancient history.

In the bill under discussion to-day we find that history has repeated itself, and in behalf of another tropical country, the Philippine Islands, you are again disregarding the explicit promise made to our people in that platform of '96, and you are seeking to again encourage the production and importation of sugar grown by the cheapest of labor from soil the richest in the world by removing the only barrier which exists between that cheap labor and our own American labor here at home. That a portion of the Filipino people are in dire need of assistance is beyond question in the minds of the members of the Taft party who recently visited the islands. While the hemp provinces are prosperous and the people contented, the sugar-growing provinces are quite the reverse, and the people there are in poverty and are dissatisfied. As one of the Taft party I shall never forget some of the scenes which were incidentally witnessed in that visit to the Philippine Islands. One of the hardest experiences which I can recall in my life was sitting at a great banquet in the beautiful pavilion erected especially for that occasion in the great square at Bacolod, and as we sat at that sumptuous repast, with the finest viands and the finest wines before us, looking at us from the outside of that pavilion were the hungry eyes of hundreds of people in dire distress resulting from the hard times and decadence of the sugar industry there.

By a subscription made by a philanthropic lady member of our party money was freely contributed by members of our party to relieve the poverty and distress in two of the cities which we visited. In one of the cities we were advised that hundreds of the poor people were sent out into the suburbs, where we would not see them. I do not think that there is any Member of this House who more fully realizes the need of help for this sugar industry in the Philippines and for the people who have been engaged in it than myself, and I will gladly join in any means of assisting them which in its provision does not menace an important industry in our own country and in which the people of my district are so vitally interested. While the present deplorable conditions in the sugar districts seem to arise from causes for which our Government is in no wise responsible—ladronism, loss of working cattle by rinderpest, failure of crops from drought, the plague, crude methods of cultivation, usurious rates of interest, etc.—the people naturally, as people do in hard times, forget the real origin of their troubles and blame the government for them, and insist that it is the duty of the government to produce a remedy for the ills from which they are suffering.

In their present trouble they have been told and they firmly believe that the abolition of the duty on their sugar coming into the United States will be a remedy for all their ills.

On the premises that the sugar-producing people of the Philippines need assistance from us there is no question, and while it may or may not be our duty, it is surely proper and right for this country, now so prosperous, to lend a helping hand industrially to these needy people, and it only remains to ascertain the best method of bringing about the desired result.

There seems to be two methods from which to choose—one theoretical, the other practical. To aid them through a lowering of the Dingley tariff is purely theoretical. In theory it is presumed that the reduction of the duty—50 per cent additional reduction of the Dingley rate—giving about 84 cents per 100 pounds, or, remembering that their sugar is mostly below grade, of about 60 cents per 100 pounds, will all go to the Filipino and increase the price of the sugar by that amount. There is, however, a barrier which will prevent this benefit reaching the Filipino to a more or less extent. This barrier is the sugar trust. [Applause.] If the seller (the Filipino) controlled the fixing of the price, then there would be no question of theory in the matter, for the seller (the Filipino) would rightly insist on adding the 60 cents per hundredweight to his present price.

The important condition of the problem is this: The duty is paid, not by the seller of the sugar, but by the buyer, the sugar trust. If the duty is reduced by 60 cents per hundredweight, why should not the trust, who pays the duty, reap the entire benefit if they do not raise the price? Now, with the theory that the sugar trust will advance its price by the full amount of 60 cents per hundredweight, as would surely follow if there was free competition, there is little or no possibility. With the sugar trust practically the only buyer, absolutely dictating the price, the reduction of the duty makes the trust the custodian of the 60 cents per hundredweight, to be divided between the buyer and the seller, with the buyer—the sugar trust—the dictator of the division. Have we any reason to believe the division will be a fair one? The same theoretical method was adopted for Cuba two years ago, when we reduced the tariff rate of their sugar 20 per cent, equivalent to 34 cents per hundredweight. The average result so far as we can learn has been that the trust has retained 23 cents and allowed only 11 cents to reach the Cuban, for whom the entire reduction of 34 cents was intended. This means that for the last year alone, with the reduction of the duty 34 cents per hundredweight, the sugar trust paid about $9,000,000 less duty than it would have paid had there been no reduction, and the revenues of the United States were diminished by that amount. With great generosity the sugar trust divided this amount, $9,000,000, placed in its custody by our Government, so that $3,000,000 went to the Cubans while $6,000,000 remained in the capacious pocket of the trust. This was the result, I believe, of the theoretical assistance to the Cubans. [Applause.] That the American people should properly understand the drift of such theoretical legislation the bill should have been entitled "A bill to assist the sugar trust," and to assist Cuba incidentally. With this object lesson only two years old, it seems strange that this Congress should use the same identical method of theoretical legislation for the relief of the Filipinos which has so miscarried for Cuba. The gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE], advocating this measure, says (p. 690, CONGRESSIONAL RECORD):

I am doubtful about the benefit to the Filipinos.

Now, if we really desire to aid the people of the sugar-growing provinces, there is a practical way—a business method. They are now suffering from three causes.

First. Usurious rates of interest—36 to 100 per cent on money borrowed to grow their crops.

Second. Underextraction (40 per cent being lost) of the sugar content of the cane.

Third. Primitive methods of cultivation.

As to the first, agricultural banks instituted temporarily by our Government, charging a normal or reasonable rate of interest, would put the Chinese usurer out of business and should not cost our Government a penny. A good profit on the crop, which now goes to the usurious Chinese broker, would then remain a profit to the planter, and which in itself would be a greater benefit to the sugar planter than would come to him from any change in the tariff. The people of the Philippines are clamoring for the establishment of such banks, and we of the Taft party heard again and again this clamor while we were in the Philippines.

In a memorial to the honorable the Secretary of War, presented by the Agricultural Association of Panay and Negros on August 15 last, we find the following section:

AGRICULTURAL MORTGAGE BANKS.

A great difficulty stands in the way of the establishment of these credit institutions in this country. There are no capitalists here to undertake such an enterprise, or at least the few which we have prefer to employ their money in the making of usurious loans, which is a more lucrative business for them.

The idea that the government should use its funds to establish these banks has many times been advanced—an idea that can not be put into practice, however, because it is alleged to be contrary to the principles of American administration, aside from the fact that the insular treasury would require large sums to establish banks in all of the provinces of the archipelago. The necessity for a class of banks that will advance money at a moderate rate of interest to owners of country lands is evident, as the conditions imposed by the Philippine money lenders are insupportable and absorb all of the profits which the farmer may obtain as the result of his labor. Hence the fact that the majority of the property owners have their estates eternally mortgaged, without hope of freeing them, on account of the usurious interest, which, multiplying annually through successive accumulations, finally results in the transfer of the property to the creditor.

Under such irritating impositions it is impossible for the farmer to sever the bonds of his humiliating condition of dependency upon usurious capital, and consequently he does not extend the area under cultivation for the purpose of increasing his aggregate production, but only tills the land he is able to with the small resources at his command, unless he is willing to run the risk of being dispossessed of his property at the end of a few years.

In view of the difficulties in the way of the establishment of mortgage banks by the Government itself, we believe that capitalists should be induced to establish them by Congressional legislation which will guarantee a profit for at least the first few years of their existence upon the amount invested in the same manner as was done by the provisions of the act relative to the construction of Philippine railroads. The law enacted for this purpose, however, should fix certain limitations in order that the advantages accruing to the agriculturalist shall be positive when he finds himself compelled to have recourse to these banks, and that the latter may not be converted into a means of gradually despoiling the farmers of their lands.

For the second cause, 40 per cent under extraction of sugar content of the cane, we can also be of assistance. In the sugar provinces we should install modern experimental mills or stations in limited number. At $250,000 each, eight could be put in operation for $2,000,000. The mills grinding for toll should be self-supporting, and if successful would lead to the building by private capital of central extraction or grinding works all over the sugar-growing country. The extraction by modern up-to-date mills would raise the quality of the planters' sugar to the standard grade, thereby giving him one-half cent more for his output than he has ever or is now obtaining. This in itself would be equal to a good profit for the planter. If the investment should prove an entire loss it would not be a serious matter. With a yearly expenditure of from $20,000,000 to $50,000,000 in Army and Navy to govern and defend these islands, $2,000,000 to $5,000,000 (not a yearly investment, but a permanent one) to aid them industrially would be a mere bagatelle.

For the third cause, crude methods of cultivation, time is the only remedy. We can, however, aid in shortening the length of time required to replace with modern progressive farming their antiquated methods by assisting the insular agricultural department to enlarge the present and operate more experimental estates in the heart of the sugar-growing districts as object lessons to the untaught Filipino farmer.

On these estates rudimentary agricultural schools should be maintained, care being taken to enroll in these schools the sons of native sugar planters.

As these last two suggestions will not be immediate in their benefits and of little or no avail to meet the present conditions, it is my belief that the 25 per cent reduction now existing on Philippine sugar should be replaced at once, the full Dingley rate collected, and the amount thus realized placed in the custody of the Philippine government to be paid to the sugar growers as a bounty, this bounty to be continued for three years, the fourth year two-thirds, and fifth year one-third of such bounty. As this bounty is withdrawn the moneys turned over by our Government from customs duties collected on Philippine imports shall be turned over to the Philippine treasury to be used as under the present law.

A million dollars could well be added yearly for the next five years to the school fund of the insular education department by our home Government, while the country is practically dependent as at present. [Applause.]

If these practical suggestions could be worked out for the benefit of the Filipino, it would be evidence enough to them of our interest and our desire to help them, and the clamoring for theoretical tariff tinkering would die out as prosperity returned. If it is the sugar trust that we desire to help, the tariff-tinkering method is all right. The sugar trust is ready and willing to profit by all such legislation.

I have listened to the magnificent presentation of the views of some of the ablest Members of this House who favor this measure. I have listened to their exhaustive arguments that Philippine sugar costs about as much laid down in New York as American beet sugar. I have not the time to go into the matter myself, but when I see, as I do, on page 149 of the Philippine hearing, in the same memorial which I mentioned a few moments ago, in this carefully prepared document, carefully considered by the president and secretary of agricultural associations of Panay and Negros, that the cost of sugar laid down in Iloilo is 1.41 cents gold per pound, and if you add interest, rent, commission, deterioration and loss of cattle the cost as given is 1.88 cents gold per pound, and if to this we add the expenses of exportation, warehouse expenses, and insurance it brings the cost to 2 cents per pound, we who live in the beet-sugar country can not comprehend for an instant how sugar manufactured and in bags delivered, with every possible expense, including interest, rent, etc., at Iloilo at 1.88 or 2 cents, take whichever figure you like, is fair competition with us, when we know that our farmers are paid for the sugar in the beets before they enter the manufactory 2.31 cents per pound.

These figures satisfy our people that there is a grave menace in this competition, if the sugar industry of the islands revives from the deplorable conditions arising from natural causes, and with which the tariff between them and us had nothing to do.

The question of difference in wages paid to their labor and our labor, and to the effectiveness of the one against the other, has also been fully discussed, and while I shall not take the time of this committee to make any discussion of the subject, I shall present to you matter bearing upon this part of the question which I find in these same Philippine hearings and from other reliable sources. Permit me to quote from page 71, from Mr. Welborn:

SUGAR—WAGES.

[Philippine hearings.]

Mr. WELBORN (page 71). We have tried native labor by the hundreds in at least two places, and we have always gotten it by paying 50 to 60 centavos (25 to 30 cents) per day. We have always been able to get all the labor we wanted by paying a little better wages than was usual.

(Note.—Filipino planters bitterly complained that we paid too high wages, making it hard for them to hold wages down.)

Again I quote from the hearing when we had Commissioner Luzuriaga, a man of undoubted probity, before us:

SUGAR—WAGES.

Q. (By Senator FOSTER.) What is the average price paid per day for labor by sugar men?

Reply. Field hands are paid from 40 to 50 centavos per day—20 to 25 cents American money—besides they are all provided with their food by the planters.

Q. (By Senator FOSTER.) You say that is 25 cents per day gold?

Reply. Yes, sir; the field hands get 25 cents gold a day and their food.

Q. What does it cost per day to feed them?

Reply (by Señor HERAS). In my province, Pampanga, it costs from 20 to 25 centavos (10 to 12½ cents gold) per day for the food. The food provided is very inferior in quality and quantity. It is not food for an American or European laborer, nor could an American subsist on it at all.

And again we have in the same hearing, pages 163 and 164:

SUGAR—WAGES.

[Philippine hearings—Señor Lacson, pages 163–164.]

Q. (By Senator NEWLANDS.) What is the price paid laborers upon the sugar plantations now?

Señor LACSON. To-day we have to pay not less than 20 cents gold per day.

Senator NEWLANDS. And what was it from 1886 to 1896?

Señor LACSON. At all times of the year, except the grinding season, we used to pay 50 cents of the currency of that time per week (8⅓ cents gold per day). During the grinding season we paid double that amount.

Senator NEWLANDS. What would that 50 cents be the equivalent of in Philippine currency to-day?

Señor LACSON. I consider the 50 cents I referred to as the equivalent of 50 cents gold. Therefore, it would be the equivalent of 1 peso Philippine currency (50 cents gold) per week.

Q. (By Representative COOPER.) Then you say that the wage had increased from 50 cents gold per week to 20 cents gold per day?

Señor LACSON. Yes, sir; and that is explained by the fact that the laborer can not live upon any less, the cost of living being so much higher than before.

Q. (By Representative COOPER.) Do you give them food?

Señor LACSON. We do not find the laborers except during the grinding season. During this season we give them two meals a day and 25 cents gold.

From Representative BONYNGE (First district Colorado), who has made exhaustive study of this question, I find that he has set the average price at 15 cents per day, including two meals. Again, from the Summary of Commerce of the Philippine Islands, July, 1901, pages 5, 6, 7:

One of the advantages possessed by the Filipino sugar planter is that he can hire help very cheaply. The average farm hand will work for 10 cents per day and board himself. Native boys may be hired still cheaper.

Concerning wages paid on sugar plantations General Hughes stated:

The ordinary wages, if paid regularly and promptly, which seem to satisfy the native, is 1 peso a week—a peso being 50 cents of our money—which means 8⅓ cents gold per day. (Statement of Gen. Robert P. Hughes, February 26, 1902, Senate Committee on the Philippines, p. 535.)

There is one important item of economy that the Negros planter has down to a fine point. The average laborer does not receive quite 16 cents gold a day in money and food combined. I have seen fifty and a hundred sitting on their tools waiting for daylight to begin a day's work. (Report of Philippine Bureau of Agriculture for year ending August 31, 1904.)

1905.

The wages paid for field labor varied from $1 to $1.50 silver currency (50 to 75 cents American currency) a week, in addition to rations and lodging. The hours of labor were from about 4 a. m. to 6 p. m., with two hours rest at noon. (From Labor Conditions in the Philippines, by Victor S. Clark, Ph. D., Bulletin of the Bureau of Labor, Department of Commerce and Labor, May, 1905, p. 751.)

In the Philippine Census, Volume IV, page 487, the total number of laborers on sugar estates is given as 45,247, and the total monthly wage rate as 388,817 pesos, or 8.60 pesos per month per employee. This is equivalent to 17 cents gold per day, and includes the food and allowance where it is given.

From the Engineering News, of New York, issue of November 23, 1905, a most exhaustive article on labor conditions in the Philippine Islands, by J. M. Bridsley, page 541:

The average wage through the provinces is somewhat less than one-half a peso (25 cents gold). During the planting and harvesting season labor may be scarce and difficult to obtain at somewhat higher prices, but lower rates prevail during the remainder of the year.

In the same article, page 543, we find in regard to men employed on the railroad from Manila to Dagupan:

The construction as well as the maintenance and operating forces are composed entirely of Filipinos, except the superintendent. The permanent works require the services of 1,300 men. Mr. Higgins, general manager of the road, says he had no serious trouble in securing laborers for new work. He states that on the new works the average period of service is about one month. Their pay days occur weekly and their wages average 25 cents gold per day.

So we find that the wages vary, from various sources considered reliable, from the petty wage involved in the peonage system, which is well known to be to some extent prevalent there, 8⅓ cents per day mentioned in some authorities, up to the highest, 25 cents per day paid for field labor in the cane districts in ordinary seasons and ordinary conditions. It does not matter what price we take in this range from 8⅓ cents to 25 cents; the Filipino laborer receives about one-sixth to one-tenth the daily wage paid to the farm laborers in the United States. As to the efficiency we find several witnesses on that subject who speak with some considerable knowledge, as follows:

There is no difficulty in securing good labor. * * * They are capable of doing as much and as hard work as any laborers we have had in the Orient. * * * This labor is very efficient. (From report of J. B. Aleshire, major and quartermaster, United States Army; Taft Philippine Commission Report, November, 1902, p. 161.)

The sugar cane of the Philippine Islands is cut entirely by the Filipinos, and they are effective, can stand the heat, and do well. (From testimony of Secretary Taft before the Insular Committee, 1902.)

I further state that my experience with labor has proved to me that in many ways the native laborers are superior to Chinese laborers. (From report of W. B. Moses, in charge of native labor and river stevedores, United States Army; Taft Philippine Commission Report, November, 1902, p. 165.)

I would respectfully state that they (Filipinos) have proven highly satisfactory. (From report of J. E. Cole, superintendent of transportation; Taft Philippine Commission Report, November, 1902, p. 174.)

It is my experience that Filipino labor is much more satisfactory in every way than Chinese labor. (From report of F. D. Grant, captain and quartermaster, United States Army; Taft Philippine Commission Report, November, 1902, p. 164.)

My opinion is that the Filipino labor is the cheapest and the best. (From report of Adam Nedar, Army Transport Service; Taft Philippine Commission Report, November, 1902, p. 165.)

In regard to crude cultivation employed in the Philippine Islands, I will call your attention to the Philippine hearing, page 170, to the questions asked of Señor Yulo, and the evidence shows that there were 40 sugar estates owned in the Yulo family.

CRUDE CULTIVATION AND LABOR.

Colonel HILL. Is there any difficulty about Filipinos to do the work needed on the plantation? Are the hands good?

Señor YULO. The generality of Filipinos would be suitable labor for the cane fields, but the difficulty is that the majority of them prefer to work in the rice fields.

Secretary TAFT. Is it harder work—to work in the cane fields?

Señor YULO. Very much so. It is especially hard, on account of the defective agricultural implements and tools which we use.

And, further, the evidence of Mr. Heil, superintendent of the government agricultural farm at La Grange, an estate of twenty-five hundred acres:

CRUDE CULTIVATION—PHILIPPINE ISLANDS.

[Mr. Heil, pages 178–179.]

Q. (By Secretary TAFT.) Now, do you know about the production among the farmers here generally?

Reply (by HEIL). Yes; the way they raise sugar it costs about twice as much as at the experimental station.

Secretary TAFT. Do you plow deeper than the planters here?

Reply (by HEIL). I plow 10 to 12 inches.

Secretary TAFT. Is that deeper than they plow?

Reply (by HEIL). They don't plow any deeper than 3 to 6 inches.

With wages to the Filipino laborer one-sixth to one-tenth of that paid to our farm laborer here in America; with efficiency I admit not equal to our own, but I can not conceive of any judgment which would put it at a greater ratio than 2 to 1, thus making labor three to five times cheaper in the Philippines than in the United States; with their primitive methods of agriculture, which when changed to modern methods should produce sugar there at one-half the cost for which they are now producing it—these all combine and constitute the gravest menace conceivable to American labor if permitted to oppose us on an even basis. With the protective principle of the Republican party always before us in the United States, in my mind we can not conceive any just reason for removing the present barrier of the Dingley tariff rate as it now exists. [Applause.]

We are not the first people who have been concerned by this same difficult problem. I notice in the daily Consular and Trade Reports, under date of December 27, 1905, only two weeks ago, that in Australia a bounty is paid for sugar grown by white labor as against sugar grown by black or cheap labor. They have met the same difficulty and they have fought it out by the most practical and direct method. We could not apply such a method as that in this country, but the barrier of the Dingley tariff will serve, as is intended to serve, the same purpose to prevent the competition of this cheap oriental labor as against our own well-paid American labor. [Applause.]

Before closing I wish to call your attention to some extracts from the Monthly Summary of Commerce of the Philippine Islands, dated December, 1904:

CHEAP LABOR.

The fact that Philippine sugar production was able to hold its own after 1885, and even make slight gains, under such a handicap of antiquated methods is only to be explained on the basis of the cheapness of labor, which made a measure of profit still possible and saved the industry from extinction or the alternative necessity of the extensive inauguration of the improved methods of more progressive countries. Such was the condition of the Philippine sugar industry as inherited by the United States in 1898—an industry operating with antiquated equipment and the crudest methods in competition with modern science and progress, engaged in a losing struggle for nearly two decades, and subsisting only through labor conditions as oriental and primitive as its equipment.

NEW ERA.

The advent of the United States in the islands is considered to have marked a new political era; but that it should at the same time inaugurate a new industrial era was inevitable. That the new era should manifest itself most forcibly in the primitive, but at the same time the most highly organized, industry of the islands was only natural, and that its effect should be disastrous is unfortunate; but it is the general penalty that extreme cases for regeneration must be preceded by destruction, and the Philippine sugar industry seems simply to be undergoing the drastic preliminaries of a reorganization on a modern basis.

POSSIBILITIES OF PHILIPPINE SUGAR CANE UNDER MODERN CONDITIONS.

That Philippine sugar cane would be entirely adequate under other conditions to this increased demand upon its output and could compete with the beet and cane product of other countries admits of no doubt. In an interesting survey of the Philippine industry by United States Consul Webb, in 1899, he states that with the stone and wooden mills of the islands only about 40 per cent of the weight of the cane is expressed in juice, and shows how the low-grade Philippine sugar could be doubled in value by the use of the improved methods of his day. By all accounts the conditions which he described have not since greatly mended, and it is obvious that between the sugar that is thus burned up in the bagasse and what is lost by unintelligent production of what is one of the lowest grade sugars on the world market there would be ample to pay the laborer his increased wage as well as to restore the industry to some measure of its former prosperity.

[Applause.]

FUTURE OF SUGAR INDUSTRY.

That there will be a reaction from the present desperate condition of the industry, and that it will ultimately be placed on an even more prosperous basis than during the closing years of the Spanish régime, is not only a matter for hope, but for reasonable anticipation. The recovery of the industry from its present unfortunate condition may not be until many years and a hard struggle, especially if no aid is extended to it, but so long as sugar cane flourishes in Negros, Panay, and Batangas as it does, the extinction of the industry by force of untoward conditions, in the face of its natural advantages, seems scarcely possible.

I have suggested in this speech a method by which this reduction of the tariff, which by our people is considered a grave menace to them can be avoided, and this plan of relief outlined here brings benefit directly to the Filipino in such manner that the sugar trust can not get any benefit therefrom, and moreover it distributes the burden of such relief upon the entire people of the United States, and does not concentrate the load upon one or two industries, thus threatening their destruction. [Loud applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from California [Mr. NEEDHAM], a member of the Ways and Means Committee, asks to be recognized for forty-five minutes.

Mr. NEEDHAM. Mr. Chairman, at the beginning, and as preliminary to what I desire to say upon the merits of the pending bill, I think it will be profitable to refer to the history of the legislation which has heretofore been considered by this House to accomplish the same purpose.

At the present time we are collecting upon articles coming into the United States from the Philippine Islands 75 per cent of the Dingley rates. This rate was fixed by an act of Congress approved March 8, 1902. During the second session of the Fifty-seventh Congress a bill was presented to the House of Representatives and favorably reported from the Ways and Means Committee further reducing the rates upon articles coming into the United States from the Philippine Islands from 75 to 25 per cent of the Dingley rates. This bill came before the House of Representatives on the 18th day of December, 1902, and after a short discussion had upon that day the bill passed the House of Representatives. The Democratic party, then under the leadership of Mr. Richardson of Tennessee, took the same position upon that bill that the Democratic party now takes upon the pending bill—that is to say, its members argued for and favored absolute free trade between the Philippine Islands and the United States and stated in their speeches that if that could not be had they would vote for the bill as presented. After offering amendments to accomplish free trade, which were voted down, the then Democratic leader upon this floor moved to recommit the bill to the Committee on Ways and Means with instructions to report a bill providing for free trade between the Philippine Islands and the United States. Upon that motion a roll call was demanded, and the motion was defeated by substantially a party vote. The bill was then passed without even a demand for a division or for a roll call, and in the parliamentary sense, therefore, the bill passed this House unanimously. I find upon looking over the record that many of the gentlemen who are now opposing the pending measure voted against recommitting the bill, and did not demand a division or roll call on the final passage, so that they might record their votes against it. Therefore they must be counted as having voted in favor of the bill.

From an examination of the debates had at that time it will be seen that no opposition was made to the bill upon the theory that is universally accepted, that the inevitable and only proper ultimate policy of our Government toward the Philippines is the policy of free trade.

The measure went to the Senate, and in the closing days of the short session was defeated by methods which are well known to us all—by methods usually adopted by members of that body when they are not willing that a measure shall come to a vote upon its merits.

In the Fifty-eighth Congress a similar measure was again introduced, and was not pushed during the first session of that Congress, for the reason, as is well known, that it seemed impossible to overcome the opposition of the small number of Senators at the other end of the Capitol. The bill, however, was reported to the House of Representatives by the Ways and Means Committee and was not taken up for the reason just stated.

The Secretary of War, who has so earnestly and unselfishly labored for legislation such as is accomplished by the pending measure, during last summer organized the party of Senators and Representatives that visited the Philippines and which trip has been so vividly described during this debate by different members of that party. The Secretary, as I understand it, invited those who are particularly prominent in opposing a reduction of duty on Philippine products, so that they might see with their own eyes the condition in the Philippines, the possibilities of those islands, and be the more able to intelligently vote upon this proposition.

I am told, Mr. Chairman, by numerous members of that party that practically every member of the party admits privately that legislation such as is sought to be accomplished by this bill would not only be harmless so far as any injury to any American industry is concerned, but would undoubtedly be highly beneficial, particularly as disclosing our good intentions toward the inhabitants of the Philippine Islands.

I recount the history of this legislation for the purpose of showing that from the very first the policy which this measure would inaugurate has been the settled policy of our Government and the Republican party and that the delay in the enactment of laws putting it into effect has been occasioned by the opposition of a ridiculously small minority, mostly at the other end of the Capitol. In fact, the bill in question or a similar one accomplishing the same purpose would have been enacted long since had it not been for the peculiar rules and methods of procedure which prevail and which require practical unanimity of action in the Senate of the United States.

Having said this much in regard to the history of the pending legislation, I now desire to discuss the merits of the legislation involved in the pending bill. And, Mr. Chairman, I approach the discussion with the full realization of the importance of the subject, not only as it affects the United States, but also as it affects the Philippine Islands.

The pending bill, if it is enacted into a law, will permit all articles, wholly the growth and product of the Philippine Islands, to enter the United States free of duty, except sugar and tobacco, upon which there is to be collected a duty of 25 per cent of the Dingley rates, until the 11th day of April, 1909, the date of the expiration of the treaty of Paris, after which there is to be freedom of commercial intercourse between the Philippines and the United States. It furthermore provides that all the revenue derived by the imposition of the 25 per cent duty on sugar and tobacco shall be turned over to the treasury of the Philippine Islands for their use and benefit. I think this states in substance that which the bill is intended to accomplish.

It is not my purpose, Mr. Chairman, to discuss the bill as it affects the tobacco question further than to say that I am convinced, after hearing all the evidence before our committee, that there is not the slightest possibility, in my opinion, of any injury to this industry.

Of course, Mr. Chairman, the injury which might be visited by this legislation upon any American industry is involved in the pending bill. I should certainly regret as sincerely as any Member of this House if such a result should follow. But, as I view the question, the fact that this legislation might possibly injure an American industry can not be as a matter of principle decisive of the issue. But before entering upon the discussion of the principle involved and the duty which is imposed upon us as Members of the American Congress in dealing with this question, I propose to discuss the measure as it relates in a practical way to the sugar industry.

I assert most confidently, after the most careful study and consideration of the evidence, and also the information which I have gained by reason of the fact that I live in a sugar-producing State, that the measure can not possibly result in the slightest injury to the sugar industry. It is true that the evidence taken before the Ways and Means Committee is conflicting, but from it the impartial investigator can arrive at a very just estimate of the value and reliability of this evidence. From the standpoint of self-interest there was much more reason why those opposing the pending measure should exaggerate their testimony than those who favor the measure, because the latter are composed of officials of the Government and of the Philippine Islands, who could have no possible self-interest to serve.

I am convinced that the report submitted, and which accompanies the bill, and made by my colleague, the chairman of the Ways and Means Committee, as to the cost of the production of sugar in the Philippines, and of beet sugar in the United States, is substantially true. From this it appears that the cost of a pound of raw sugar produced in the Philippines and delivered at the sugar ports, Iloilo and Manila, is 1½ cents per pound. This does not allow anything for interest on plant or property or for depreciation. Add to this freight to the United States, insurance, waste, loading and unloading, refining, and duty as provided for in this bill, and items of interest on plant, wear and tear of same, and interest on value of the cargo in transit, brings the cost on Philippine sugar refined at New York to approximately from 3½ to 4 cents per pound. It certainly will not be less than 3½ cents per pound, and in many cases will reach higher than 4 cents per pound. Then add to this the freight which is necessary to place such sugar in the principal markets of the eastern part of our country and you will at once see from a comparison of the cost of sugar raised in Michigan, Colorado, or California, even if the whole duty is taken off, that Philippine sugar will be at a great disadvantage, because all the evidence goes to show that a pound of beet sugar raised in any one of the sugar-producing regions of the United States is less than the figures I have just given as the cost of Philippine sugar. Furthermore, the cost of producing beet sugar in this country is constantly and rapidly decreasing. Improved machinery, improved methods of extracting saccharine matter, the profit of by-products, and the improvement in cultivation of beets are surely and rapidly bringing down the cost of this product.

I am not much of a hand for statistics, and as a rule I am not given to their use to any great extent, but there are a few prominent and significant facts in the sugar question which stand out so clearly and prominently as to be of the highest value in reaching a conclusion upon this question. For instance, it is indisputably shown from statistics that the people of the United States purchased from the sugar countries of the world sugar to the amount of $150,000,000 during the year 1905 to supply the demand for consumption in the United States proper. This was in addition to what we produced in the beet-sugar regions and the cane-sugar regions of Louisiana and the South. It is also shown from statistics that the per capita consumption of sugar in the United States is a little over 70 pounds, while the per capita consumption of sugar in the United Kingdom is about 90 pounds. In other words, notwithstanding that we are underconsuming by 20 pounds per capita, and notwithstanding our great possibilities for sugar production, still we are as yet able to produce upon our own soil and upon the territory under our control but a ridiculously small percentage of the amount we consume. I will insert a table upon this question which shows some light upon this phase of the question.

Now, Mr. Chairman, if our population grows to 100,000,000 people, as it may by the next census, and we continue to grow in wealth and consuming power at the rate we have heretofore, does anyone believe for a moment that the admission of sugar from the Philippine Islands will have the slightest possible effect upon the growth of the beet-sugar industry of the United States?

A study of the history of the sugar industry in Hawaii will be interesting as bearing upon this question. We have had free sugar from Hawaii since 1875, either under reciprocity or since that Territory came under the flag of the United States. The natural market for the Hawaiian sugar is the Pacific coast, and notwithstanding the fact that this sugar enters the Pacific coast ports free of duty, still, in the face of this, the beet-sugar industry on the Pacific coast has grown and multiplied in direct competition with free cane sugar from Hawaii. An examination of statistics upon this point is most instructive and interesting, and it will be found that while prior to the growth of beets in California Hawaiian sugar held exclusively that market, to-day the sugars of Hawaii are seeking the markets of the Eastern States, either around the Horn or going across the continent by rail from San Francisco. Practically all the sugar from Hawaii which is put upon the market in San Francisco is sugar that is refined on the Pacific coast by individuals or corporations owning the sugar plantations in Hawaii and owning also the refineries on the Pacific coast. In other words, the great bulk of the Hawaiian sugar which remains in California and the Pacific Coast States is simply the sugar that is raised and refined by one and the same owner. When the present bill was under consideration before the Committee on Ways and Means the evidence shows that Philippine sugar, so far as it would come to the United States, would come to the Atlantic ports and seek the great market which is open to it in the eastern States of our country. In fact, Mr. Chairman, the difficulty in California in raising sugar is not because capital is not willing to go into the industry, but the great difficulty is in getting the farmers to contract and agree to grow beets.

The farmers of our State have experienced more or less difficulty with those managing the factories, and, besides, the land of the State of California which is suitable for growing beets is in many instances much more valuable for other purposes. At the present time I am reliably informed that capital is ready to establish beet-sugar factories in the State of California at several points, provided there can be obtained farmers who will enter into contracts to grow and raise beets for a sufficient length of time.

It is true that several of the beet-sugar factories in our State have created great prosperity and brought happiness and growth to many communities. We have a factory in my district, located at Spreckles, in Monterey County, which, so far as I know, has had satisfactory dealings with the farmers of that neighborhood. This factory has, according to my information, treated its patrons most satisfactorily. Last year this factory sliced 170,000 tons of beets, of which 126,000 tons were grown in Salinas Valley, 23,500 tons in the Pajaro Valley, 14,000 tons in the Santa Clara Valley, and 6,500 tons in the San Juan Valley, during a campaign which begun on September 20 and closed December 9 last. This factory has raised the price of beets to the farmer during the last year, and I understand that people are now entering in contracts at increased price for additional acreage. While this factory has been fair in its treatment and successful in its operation, another factory which was built in my district, at the town of Watsonville, has been dismantled because of the fact, as I am told, that farmers found it more profitable to grow other crops, and I also understand that their relations with the factory managers were not satisfactory.

I therefore take it, Mr. Chairman, that the beet-sugar industry of the Pacific coast has been inaugurated and has grown and prospered, notwithstanding and in spite of the competition of free sugar from the Hawaiian Islands. And, furthermore, because at the present time capital is seeking areas in our State where they can enter into contract with owners of the land for raising of beets in order to manufacture sugar, that the industry is fairly profitable, and that the introduction of the small amount of sugar which would naturally and probably come from the Philippine Islands, all of which, as I have shown, would seek the markets of the Eastern States, that in view of all of these facts the industry in the State which I have the honor to represent in part is in no sense menaced if this bill should become a law. I would certainly regret to cast any vote in this House which would in any way jeopardize or threaten a single industry of my district or State or country.

I dislike to repeat statistics and arguments which have been so frequently used upon this floor during the debate, and it is not my purpose to do so any more than is actually necessary to make clear my argument. There has been a great deal of loose talk and a great deal of speculation indulged in as to the possibilities of the Philippines as a producer of sugar, tobacco, and other tropical and semitropical products. When we originally acquired the Philippines, our people as a whole were so ignorant of them that very few knew where they were situated. The debates in Congress which followed their acquisition disclosed a lack of knowledge of their size, products, and possibilities that in the light of the Philippine census, which has been recently taken, is most remarkable, and even in this debate many of these exaggerated statements have been repeated. Mr. Chairman, even if we admit and accept as probable the most exaggerated prophecy which has been made, still these islands can not in any degree be a menace to our industries. Just consider for a moment the size of the islands, their total area being but 73,000,000 acres, or about 123,000 square miles, while the State of California has 99,950,000 acres, or 156,000 square miles. The Territory of New Mexico has 122,000 square miles and is nearer the size of the Philippine Islands than any other State or Territory of the Union. Suppose every acre of the Territory of New Mexico was capable of the most intensified cultivation, does any man upon this floor believe for one moment, even under favorable conditions, that the products of such an area could swamp or destroy or even remotely threaten the growth and prosperity of the forty-five States of the Union or any one of them. [Applause.]

Assuming that there is a high percentage of the land in the Philippines, if you please, for the sake of argument—admit that the percentage is higher of tillable land in that archipelago than the average throughout the world—still is it possible for anyone to seriously argue that under the most modern and up-to-date methods of cultivation it would be in any sense able to furnish serious competition to the products of any industry of our home country? And then, besides, Mr. Chairman, we must remember that land in the Philippine Islands will naturally be tilled in the most profitable lines, and it is shown most conclusively that hemp and cocoanuts are the most natural and most profitable crops to be grown on these islands—in fact, these islands have the monopoly on the production of hemp in the markets of the world.

Then there is the question of labor and capital, both of which must be present in any region to make profitable an industry, and both capital and labor are absent in the Philippine Islands, and, in my judgment, will be slow to enter there. As to the truth of this statement, the evidence is, to my mind, most conclusive. In fact, this would seem to be one of the great causes of the lack of prosperity in the Philippines. Our exclusion laws, as has been explained, are applicable to the Philippine Islands. Our contract-labor laws apply to these islands, and it is universally considered that without an abundant supply of labor there can be little, if any, development in the sugar industry there. What little labor there is available is inefficient and uncertain, and, because of this inefficiency and uncertainty, is dear and expensive even though the rate of wages when first stated seems to be very low, but when examined and understood as to results is very dear. Furthermore, it is well known that under the act which we passed at the last session of Congress and which provides for the building of railroads under the guaranty of income by the government of the Philippine Islands, the surplus labor of the islands will naturally and inevitably be used in railroad construction. The contractors for these railroads will be compelled to pay a comparatively high price for the labor of the Philippine Islands, and this will, for some years to come, make labor there scarce and, as compared with the present scale of wages, high. Therefore it would seem that the rapid development of the sugar industry in the Philippines, owing to adverse labor conditions, is extremely improbable and will necessarily be slow. Suppose, however, that within a comparatively short time the output of Philippine sugar would reach as high a point as it did some years ago. The highest amount of Philippine sugar ever exported, so far as the records show, has never reached 300,000 tons. Last year the total amount of Philippine sugar exported to all countries was about 125,000 tons, and this was about 4 per cent of the amount consumed in the United States. Therefore, if we receive in our markets 300,000 tons of Philippine sugar, it would be ridiculously small as compared with the amount we consume. And when we furthermore consider that last year, the year 1905, we produced in the United States only 21 per cent of the sugar we consumed and we were obliged to buy abroad about 80 per cent of the sugar that we need, can anyone for a moment believe that even under the most favorable circumstances there is any possible danger to the industry in the United States?

Furthermore, Mr. Chairman, the raising of sugar in the Tropics, outside of Cuba and Hawaii, has not been upon the whole a most profitable undertaking. Take the island of Java, which is similarly situated to the Philippines, and in many respects similar, yet notwithstanding the fact that the home government of Java built the sugar factories and rented the lands to the farmers, and subsequently turned over to them under the most favorable terms the factories and gave long-term leases of the estates, yet records show that sugar production in Java has been anything but a profitable line of industry.

The fact of the matter is that people in the Temperate Zone have little to fear from the competition of the people of the Tropics. The energy, the thrift, and the power of initiation which resides with the people of the Temperate Zone have always enabled them in all stages of history to compete successfully in most all lines of industry with the people of all the other portions of the world. The fact of the matter is that at the present time the beet-sugar industry of the United States is confronted with a greater menace from the beet-sugar countries of Europe than from the cane-sugar industry of the Philippine Islands. If you will turn to the Daily Consular Report of January 10, 1906, page 4, you will find there an article upon beet-sugar increase in the countries of Europe, and it is estimated that these countries will increase the beet-sugar output during the next year by 50 per cent. I will insert this table as a part of my remarks.

Mr. Chairman, it seems to me that every Californian and every man from the Pacific coast and the West should support the present measure, if for no other reason than as a matter of gratitude. We all remember that for some years prior to the year 1898 the Pacific coast and ports of San Francisco, Portland, and Seattle had not enjoyed the prosperity which the resources of that section of the country would naturally justify. The city of San Francisco, magnificently situated upon one of the finest harbors of the world, in the midst of the region of the greatest natural resources, had been for some years prior to the Spanish war in a comparative state of stagnation, but with the acquisition of the Philippine Islands that city and the State which I have the honor to in part represent upon this floor, and the States of Oregon and Washington and their principal ports, awakened as if by magic, and the millions of dollars which were expended by the Government in our section of the country transferred those cities into prosperous, booming cities, lit up the fires of prosperity along the whole Pacific coast, and exhilarated to a degree the growth which has continued from that time to the present.

Therefore, I say, as a matter of gratitude alone we owe it to ourselves, we owe it to our country, to do everything possible in our power to promote the present welfare and prosperity of the Philippine people. Mr. Chairman, the growth in the Philippine trade from the United States since American occupation has been multiplied by four, and practically one-third of the trade of the Philippine Islands from the United States comes from the Pacific coast. Therefore, from the standpoint of self-interest and from the standpoint of the future of the section of the country which I have the honor to represent, I am glad to give my support to this measure.

Mr. Chairman, the State of California, which rejoices in the magnificent growth and development of the beet-sugar industry in our State and, while as I have heretofore said, capital is seeking investment in this line of industry at various points in our State where the farmers can be induced to subscribe to contracts for the growing of sufficient acreage to justify the expenditure of the necessary money to build beet-sugar factories, still we are glad to say that the State of California is not dependent upon any one industry. We are glad that our State is a State of diversified industries. I do not wish to say anything detrimental to any other portion of the Union, but we, in California, believe that we have great possibilities in diversified industries; that we have as great opportunities for growth and development as any other section of the Union. Facing, as we do, the broad Pacific, looking out toward the markets of the Orient, as a Representative upon this floor I would consider myself extremely foolish if I cast a vote which would imperil or jeopardize the trade in our insular possessions in the Pacific. [Loud applause.]

Mr. Chairman, much has been said here in this debate about pioneer spirit of the West. The gentleman from Colorado [Mr. BONYNGE] spoke most eloquently and effectively of the pioneers of the State of Colorado. His arguments in other forms have been repeated by his colleague and by the gentlemen representing the States of Wyoming and Montana upon this floor. Mr. Chairman, I find from examination of the Congressional Directory that those gentlemen, to whom I have just referred, went to their respective States at comparatively recent dates. None of them had the honor to be born in the West, and the gentleman from Wyoming, who has so strenuously opposed this measure, I find is a pioneer of 1887, and all of the other gentlemen went to their States at subsequent dates. They belong to that class which we term in the West the "tenderfoot class," and one of the leading characteristics of this class is the inclination to be stampeded. [Laughter.] It seems to me that in this bill these Representatives have permitted themselves to be stampeded and to have taken counsel of their fears.

I also find from examination that my friend from Wyoming, who has so strenuously opposed this bill, obtained his insight into the sugar question at a time when he was making a visit some years ago to the Hawaiian Islands. I have taken particular pains to investigate this matter, and find that I am correct. In fact, he refers to this matter in his speech delivered here upon this floor a few days ago, and he states in effect that he investigated the statistics of the sugar question while in the island and that he studied the question of capitalization of the various companies engaged there in sugar production. I also find upon further investigation that the gentleman from Wyoming upon that trip to the Hawaiian Islands, instead of primarily going to that delightful territory for the purpose of investigating the dry statistics of the sugar question, was in reality taking the trip as a part of his wedding journey. [Laughter.] Now, Mr. Chairman, I am willing to leave it to the majority of this House whether the evidence upon the question of sugar of any man who is taking his honeymoon trip is not exaggerated to that degree as to be entirely and wholly valueless for any purpose. [Laughter and applause.]

There has been a great deal of discussion both in the debate and in private conversation since this bill has been before the House as to the effect of this legislation. Some very able gentlemen have stated in my hearing that they were somewhat in doubt as to their votes, because they fear that this legislation would not result in benefits to the Philippine people, but whatever benefit accrued would go to the sugar trust. In the first place, it is significant that the sugar trust and their representatives are fighting the present measure—at least, some of their representatives are—and I therefore conclude that if the trust would get all of the benefit, or a good share of the benefit, under this bill that it would have no objections to its passing. I do not think anyone outside of the members of the trust will be able to state just what interest the sugar trust, so called, has in the sugar-beet industry of this country. That the sugar trust has an interest, and undoubtedly a very large one, in many of the beet-sugar factories of this country can not be doubted.

I am told that immediately after the passage of the Cuban reciprocity law representatives of the sugar trust, realizing that the beet-sugar industry of this country could not be crushed or destroyed, concluded it would be the wisest policy to purchase an interest in the sugar-beet industry, and so that institution has purchased, if I am correctly informed, an interest in many of the factories of the various States, and in each State it has a representative in whose name the stock of the American Sugar Refining Company, known as a trust, stands as trustee. I notice from the Wall Street Journal of a recent date, which, by the way, is undoubtedly a very reliable trade journal, a statement to the effect that it is unlikely that any official statement of the relations between the American Sugar Refining Company and the American Beet Sugar Company, and other beet-sugar concerns, will be volunteered. In other words, the Wall Street Journal admits the interest which the sugar trust has in the beet-sugar industry. That interest is unknown, but it has been stated that it approximates 50 per cent. There is evidence, therefore, that whatever the sugar trust or its representatives have done has been against the passage of this bill. We present this measure and ask for its enactment on the theory that it will benefit the industry. As to what exact proportion of the benefit will go to the Philippine planter, as to what exact proportion will go to the laborer upon the plantations, as to what exact proportion will go to the refiner, no one can tell. When we pass a tariff schedule to protect an industry, the legislator who votes for the enactment of such schedule votes for it for the purpose, if he be a protectionist, of developing the industry which the tariff affects. But I take it that no legislator would presume to apportion the benefits which may accrue to the industry as between the laborer and the producer of the raw material or the manufacturer of the finished product. If the legislation benefits an industry, we must trust the laws of trade to apportion the benefits.

Others in this discussion have engaged in the speculation as to what market the Philippine sugar will likely seek in the event of the passage of this bill. It has been claimed that it will seek the near-by markets of Japan and China and that but a small proportion of it will come to the United States. Mr. Chairman, I am not enough of a trade expert to prophesy upon this question. I have an opinion, however, that it will increase in the markets of Japan and China, but so long as I am convinced that the whole of the production, if it comes into the United States, will harm no industry and serve to supply our demand, I can not see that it becomes of very great importance.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I want to come to the discussion of the principle involved in this bill, because to my mind there is a most important principle involved, and which can not in justice be disregarded. I am a protectionist, and a sincere protectionist. That policy is fundamental in our party, but the protection which I have always understood, and for which our party has always stood, is a policy coextensive with the authority which enacts protective laws and under which all classes and sections of the country under the flag share equally in its benefits. [Applause.] The glory of the protective policy is that it safeguards, protects, and encourages all industries and all peoples under our authority which are subject to the national legislative will, and in its most perfect exemplification treats all foreign people and nations upon equal terms, except only as modified in a few instances by special trade arrangements, known as "reciprocity." The protectionist who advocates, as a permanent policy of the Government, the erection of the discriminatory policy toward any of the territory under the control of Congress, in my judgment, does violence to the fundamental principles of the protective policy. The treaty of Paris, by express terms, left with the Congress of the United States the determination of the status of the territory acquired as a result of the war with Spain. We have already abolished all duties upon products from Porto Rico. We have never attempted for one moment, and no one ever suggested, so far as I know, to discriminate against the products of Hawaii or Alaska.

As bearing upon this question, I desire to read an editorial which appeared in the San Francisco Chronicle in a recent issue, entitled:

FREE TRADE WITH PHILIPPINES—THE AMERICAN PROTECTIVE LEAGUE TO OPPOSE IT.

The Chronicle has stood for the policies of the American Protective League so long and so sturdily that it can not escape feeling deep regret to see it violating every principle of national decency by opposing free trade between the United States and the Philippines. We have seized those islands and conquered their people by force of arms. If our troops were removed to-day, the islanders would rise and massacre every American in the islands, and we all know it. Whatever we may hope for the future, the present condition of the Philippines is that of a conquered province. We have taken upon ourselves the responsibility of the government of those islands, and if we do not do that which will most inure to the prosperity and happiness of their people we shall deserve and receive the execration of mankind for our infidelity to a great trust, and their scorn and contempt for double-dyed hypocrisy in professing such intentions. Nothing but the bonds of commerce will ever make the Filipinos loyal to America or patiently endure American rule. Nothing but free trade will ever induce that commerce. That which the Filipinos require as the first step toward good citizenship is markets for the products of industry. That we can give them. If we refuse to put them on a commercial equality with our own people, we shall deserve and receive the hatred with which all oppressed people regard their oppressors.

Whether it will be gainful or injurious to us to give the Filipinos free access to our markets is not to have the slightest consideration. It was a proper matter to be considered before we seized them. With the ratification of the treaty of Paris free trade ceased to be a debatable question. But there can be no doubt that free trade would be marvelously profitable to us. Considering the matter in its narrowest aspect, the value of free trade to our deep-sea shipping would vastly outweigh its injury to the tobacco trust. Our shipowners are howling for subsidies. The best subsidy which we can give them is valuable new business, restricted to American bottoms. But free trade with the Philippines will do far more than that. It will relieve the drain on our Treasury, caused by the maintenance of an army in the Philippines and a fleet to transport it back and forth. And it should be worth something to all of us to feel that the American people can be relied on to give everybody a square deal, and that no man may rightfully call us a nation of hypocrites and sneaks.

There is no journal in the world more stalwart and outspoken than the Chronicle in defense of protection. But the protection which we favor is protection coextensive with the authority which enacts protective laws and under which all classes share equally in the prosperity which it creates, whether their particular products are protected or not. If it should ever appear that protection is a system under which one class profits at the expense of another class subject to the same government, the whole system is doomed and will deserve to be doomed.

Now, Mr. Chairman, it is contended by some of those opposing this bill that because it does not in terms extend the Dingley tariff around the Philippine Islands we are not in any way bound to enact the measure under consideration. In my judgment, Mr. Chairman, the Dingley rates must inevitably and naturally be extended around the islands with the expiration of the treaty of Paris, and it is no argument for us to contend at this time that because we are prevented by the treaty from doing full justice that therefore we should make no attempt to do partial justice.

The only alternative suggested by those who oppose this bill is the argument presented by the leaders on the Democratic side, and, I regret to say, echoed by a few upon this side of the Chamber, that we should, because of the burden which their control brings upon us as a Government, abandon them, pull down the flag, and leave the government of those people to themselves. Mr. Chairman, I never expected to live to see the day when any man upon this side of the Chamber, in view of our party's policy from the very beginning, who would seriously advocate what seems to me, speaking most respectfully, a cowardly course. Personally I do not believe that we will be called upon to consider the final disposition of those islands for one or two generations. It may be pertinent here to recall the language of McKinley upon this subject in his message to the first session of the Fifty-sixth Congress, which was the first session I had the honor to be a Member of Congress. He states:

The future government of the Philippines rests with the Congress of the United States. Few graver responsibilities have ever been confided to us. If we accept them in a spirit worthy of our race and our traditions, a great opportunity comes with them. The islands lie under the shelter of our flag. They are ours by every title of law and equity. They can not be abandoned. If we desert them, we leave them at once to anarchy and finally to barbarism. We fling them, a golden apple of discord, among the rival powers, no one of which could permit another to seize them unquestioned. Their rich plains and valleys would be the scene of endless strife and bloodshed. The advent of Dewey's fleet in Manila Bay instead of being, as we hope, the dawn of a new day of freedom and progress, will have been the beginning of an era of misery and violence worse than any which has darkened their unhappy past. The suggestion has been made that we could renounce our authority over the islands and, giving them independence, could retain a protectorate over them. This proposition will not be found, I am sure, worthy of your serious attention. Such an arrangement would involve at the outset a cruel breach of faith. It would place the peaceable and loyal majority, who ask nothing better than to accept our authority, at the mercy of the minority of armed insurgents. It would make us responsible for the acts of the insurgent leaders and give us no power to control them. It would charge us with the task of protecting them against each other and defending them against any foreign power with which they chose to quarrel. In short, it would take from the Congress of the United States the power of declaring war and vest that tremendous prerogative in the Tagal leader of the hour.

Mr. Chairman, in the closing hours of this debate, which has now been prolonged for over a week, I do not believe it is necessary or profitable to further multiply arguments upon the question. My duty in the premises seems clear. The passage of this act is demanded by the Philippine Commission, whose unselfish work in upholding the authority of the United States in those islands has been most difficult, and anything and everything that we can do to lighten their labor should be cheerfully accorded. It will be a discharge of our "plain duty," as declared by the lamented McKinley; it will not harm or threaten a single American industry; it will promote our trade and commerce and benefit our shipping interests; it will be an evidence to the Philippine people that we are sincere in our professions toward them; it will stand out among the nations of the earth as an indication that we propose to sacredly discharge in honor the duty imposed upon us.

This Republic was founded upon the theory that taxation without representation is tyranny. We, the sons of the founders of this country, can not afford to give the lie to the very principle under which our Government was founded. For one I do not hesitate to cast my vote in favor of this measure. [Prolonged applause.]

APPENDIX.

[Extract from message of President Roosevelt to first session Fifty-ninth Congress.]

The agricultural conditions of the islands enforce more strongly than ever the argument in favor of reducing the tariff on the products of the Philippine Islands entering the United States. I earnestly recommend that the tariff now imposed by the Dingley bill upon the products of the Philippine Islands be entirely removed, except the tariff on sugar and tobacco, and that that tariff be reduced to 25 per cent of the present rates under the Dingley Act; that after July 1, 1909, the tariff upon tobacco and sugar produced in the Philippine Islands be entirely removed, and that free trade between the islands and the United States in the products of each country then be provided for by law.

I do not anticipate that free trade between the islands and the United States will produce a revolution in the sugar and tobacco production of the Philippine Islands. So primitive are the methods of agriculture in the Philippine Islands, so slow is capital in going to the islands, so many difficulties surround a large agricultural enterprise in the islands, that it will be many, many years before the products of those islands will have any effect whatever upon the markets of the United States. The problem of labor is also a formidable one with the sugar and tobacco producers in the islands. The best friends of the Filipino people and the people themselves are utterly opposed to the admission of Chinese cooly labor. Hence the only solution is the training of Filipino labor, and this will take a long time. The enactment of a law by the Congress of the United States making provision for free trade between the islands and the United States, however, will be of great importance from a political and sentimental standpoint; and while its actual benefit has doubtless been exaggerated by the people of the islands, they will accept this measure of justice as an indication that the people of the United States are anxious to aid the people of the Philippine Islands in every way, and especially in the agricultural development of their archipelago. It will aid the Filipinos without injuring interests in America.

BEET-SUGAR INCREASE—EUROPE ADDS NEARLY 50 PER CENT TO CROP.

The beet-sugar crop of Europe for 1905–6 is estimated at 6,855,000 tons by a Belgian journal, La Meuse, of Liege. This shows an increase over the previous year's crop of almost 50 per cent, according to the following table forwarded by Consul McNally:

Country.	Estimated, 1906.	Actual, 1905.
	Tons.	Tons.
France	1,050,000	633,000
Belgium	330,000	175,000
Holland	200,000	137,000
Germany	2,325,000	1,595,000
Austria-Hungary	1,480,000	889,000
Russia	1,075,000	940,000
Sweden	120,000	84,000
Denmark	65,000	48,000
Spain	90,000	98,000
Italy	85,000	75,000
Roumania	25,000	19,000
Switzerland, Servia, Bulgaria, and Greece	10,000	8,000
Total	6,855,000	4,701,000

It is estimated that the excess production of the current year will be about 2,150,000 tons of raw sugar as compared with the actual production of the preceding year. This excessive increase would make the present year the greatest known in the history of the industry. While the above estimate is given as probable, the stock of the preceding year on the 1st of September was greater than on that date of the present year. This increase will influence an enhanced consumption, of which the month of October is a forerunner. (Daily Consular and Trade Reports, January 10, 1906.)

PHILIPPINE TRADE QUADRUPLED UNDER AMERICAN RULE.

Figures furnished by the Bureau of Statistics, Department of Commerce and Labor, show that the value of the commerce between the United States and the Philippine Islands for the present calendar year is likely to reach $20,000,000, against $15,000,000 for the preceding year. Our trade with the islands is now nearly four times as great as in the last year of Spanish control. For the ten months ending October 30 the value of imports from the islands to the United States was $12,650,000 and the exports from the United States to the islands nearly $5,000,000. The value of hemp received from the islands for the ten months ending October, 1905, was $10,376,528, and that of sugar $2,216,249. The exports to the islands include agricultural implements, cars and carriages, manufactures of cotton, iron and steel, leather, wood, etc.

The table which follows shows the value of imports from and exports to the Philippine Islands in each of the calendar years from 1895 to 1904, and in the ten months of the calendar year 1905.

[a] Leading refiners state that little or no sugar is manufactured from domestic molasses; also that in refining there is only about 2 per cent waste of original weight. Messrs. Willett & Gray, New York, state that of the sugar consumed in 1902 only about 44,749 tons were unrefined.

[b] Includes 309,070 tons Hawaiian, 66,279 tons Porto Rican, and 5,100 tons Philippine sugar.

[f] Includes 376,497 tons Hawaiian, 124,928 tons Porto Rican, and 14,673 tons Philippine sugar.

NOTE.—The per cent share of domestic sugar (beet, cane, maple, and molasses) in the total consumption of the continental United States was: 1904 (calendar year), 18.8; 1905 (calendar year), 21.9.

Mr. MOUSER. Mr. Chairman, I thank this House for its time for a few minutes in which to present my protest against the passage of the pending measure.

The many able, logical, and earnest speeches upon all phases of the question by our distinguished leaders and by leaders of the opposing side of the House has brought to our attention the facts upon which we must soon register our votes and declare our judgments.

I have been peculiarly impressed and at the same time somewhat amused in seeing the champions of tariff for revenue only, or free trade, and ardent protectionists arm in arm, shoulder to shoulder, in enthusiastic support of a great measure, the correct settlement of which is of vital import to some of our great industries. The Democrats are naturally jubilant, because they see in the actions of many of the leading Republican Members the approval of their theories and the ultimate overthrow of protection and the triumph of their doctrines. I have not been slow to discern through the progress of this debate the smiles of Democracy on the other side of the House as they gleefully contemplate Republicans deserting their principles and worshiping at the shrine of their false gods. This smile is not one of approval; it is not the glad reflection of honest, reciprocal emotions; rather is it the laugh of derision at the unprecedented actions of those who hitherto have nobly and fearlessly championed the cause of protection.

It seems to bode evil; it seems to foreshadow the day when these same Democrats, through the press and on the stump, will proclaim, boastfully and triumphantly, that the great American doctrine of protection—the rallying cry of our party for years—has been abandoned in this case by its most loyal advocates. What will be our answer to the people then? What will we say to our friends who will demand an explanation? Can we say that our wards are better, indeed, than the members of our own household? Can we say that we owe a duty to the brown men of the East above our obligations to the farmers, laboring men, and manufacturers of our own country? Can we delude them into believing that charity for a different race, a different people, should be generously bestowed before considering the needs, comforts, and betterment of those of our own blood, our own citizenship, our own people? No. These answers will not suffice; they will not explain to thousands of Republicans, who will be led away by the more plausible, yet delusive story of our Democratic friends.

We should first do for, and legislate on behalf of, our own people for their good, their upbuilding, before even thinking of the wants, the claims, of another people, especially when the good we do others will sacrifice the industries of our own people. [Applause.]

The song of sacred duty, of solemn obligation to the Philippines has become discordant, dissonant, and almost a mockery. In five years we have done more for them than Spain did in hundreds of years. We have unfurled our flag over them, with all its salutary and inspiring influences; we have established schools for them and have expended millions for their education; we have awakened and fostered their industries, established for them a stable form of government, and led them to higher planes of education and Christianity. Our kindness and munificence, our very tenderness for them can only be applauded and redound to our honor and credit. So far humane treatment has won us laurels and will reward us richly. We have, indeed, helped to accomplish much for them without impinging upon or affecting the rights and duties we owe first to our own people.

It is now proposed, and I believe unwisely, to further assist and upbuild them by reducing present tariff rates on certain products coming into this country from their country—namely, rice, sugar, and tobacco—and allow them to ship us all products absolutely free of duty in 1909. If this can be accomplished without crippling or destroying our own American industries, then, for one, I can give my hearty approval of the course. But if this action will destroy one factory, rob one American farmer or laborer, then, in the name of my country and its citizenship, I protest. [Applause.] The failure of the pending measure will not retard progression, nor will it affect the present or future condition of the Philippines. In this I am borne out and supported by the ablest champions of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. KEIFER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Ohio be allowed ten minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio asks unanimous consent that his colleague may be allowed ten minutes more. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. MOUSER. Its passage is sought mainly for the future good it may do them. If this bill enacted into law could at the same time accomplish their prosperity and advancement without affecting our material interests it would, indeed, be a safe, wise, and salutary policy to adopt. But consistently, logically, and from the standpoint of common sense it must ultimately have the very opposite effect; so my reason teaches me, so my judgment prompts me.

It is unfair, unjust, and indeed irrational to presume or believe that giving to others what rightfully belongs to us will assist or enrich us. But many argue that there should be free trade between this country and our possessions, because they, for the present at least, are under our protection. Some go so far as to make the unfair and illogical statement that the same rights and privileges existing between the several States of the Union should be maintained between this country and the Philippines. This peculiar doctrine is naturally upheld and defended by the free traders, but it is certainly an anomalous position to be taken by protectionists.

Free trade between the States is guaranteed by our Constitution and upheld by our beneficent laws. Our rights to impose tariff duties on the imports of our possessions is sustained by our highest court. In the first case, one fundamental law wisely establishes trade relations between sister States of a great Republic for the mutual upbuilding and benefit of each and all. In the other case, our law upholds a just policy which inures to the protection of these same States, this same Republic.

Above all, our own land, its people, its institutions, should be first protected. The Philippines are thousands of miles away. They came to us as the result of war, and their ownership was never dreamed of when the gallant Dewey won his matchless victory 'neath the burning skies of the Orient. These people are none of us by blood, by kindred ties, nor by any other reason except the decree of war. They are distinct from us in language, in race, manners, habits, and customs. They are foreigners in every sense. They are semibarbarous, unused to American ways and methods, and unlike our people in every particular. They live under a sun which renders men nerveless, trifling, easily satisfied with the commonest things of life. You can not create them anew. God first made them. Then, how can we in reason contend that we owe them the same rights, the same duties, the same protection that we owe our own citizenship? This argument is based on false premises, and can find no firm lodgment in reasoning minds. It may mislead and deceive for the present; yea, it may secure the passage of a bill, but a time will come when protectionists will regret their action. When the cheap, servile, dependent labor of these islands has driven the well-paid, well-fed, independent labor of this country from the fields of employment; when splendid industries owned by American capital have closed their doors; when the honest, hardy farmer loses the profits of his well-tilled fields—then, then will Republicans come to appreciate the wrong they have brought upon their own people through their permitting generous impulses and benevolent feelings to rule and misguide their judgment.

Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. MOUSER. Now a few moments to the substantiation of these statements. It is proposed in this measure to reduce the tariff on raw sugar, etc., to 25 per cent of the Dingley law rate for the purpose of encouraging and development of the particular industry and others in the Philippines. I shall confine my argument to the sugar question, because a portion of the district I have the honor to represent is largely devoted to beet culture and the manufacture of beet sugar. This proposed action, in my judgment, is un-Republican and contrary to the express declarations of our party on this question. Our platform of 1896—the one upon which our lamented William McKinley, Ohio's noblest son, led our party to triumph—said:

> We condemn the present Administration for not keeping faith with the sugar producers of this country. The Republican party favors such protection as shall lead to the production on American soil of all the sugar which the American people use, and for which they pay other countries more than $100,000,000 annually.

This declaration has the true ring of protection, and, followed, it would tend to the growth and development of this particular industry until, indeed, it would lead to the production on American soil of all the sugar which we use.

On the other hand, the passage of this bill, in view of the number of acres in the Philippines which will produce sugar cane (the cheapness of labor in these islands representing practically the raw product), will eventually lead, as I believe, to the destruction of this industry.

The total area of this archipelago is 73,000,000 acres in round numbers, of which 68,000,000 are owned by our Government. Governor Taft, before the Philippine Committee, said:

> These Islands have very much more arable land, very much more rich soil, than have the Japanese islands, which support 48,000,000 people as compared with the 7,000,000 who live in these islands.

It is stated by reliable sources that 50,000,000 acres of these islands are richer than the lands of either Hawaii or the United States. It is said authoritatively that 150,000 acres of these lands will produce two tons of cane sugar to the acre. If this be true, then 1,500,000 acres, speaking conservatively and within the facts, would supply all the sugar we consume in this country.

That these islands offer rich fields for the development of this competing industry is proven by the statements of Governor Taft and others. In answer to this question by Mr. Moody, "So that is another place where the sugar of the world can be produced?" Governor Taft answered:

> Yes; I have no doubt that there is enough land there if the sugar was properly cultivated to raise—well, I do not know how much Cuba can raise, but if conditions favor us we are going to be a great sugar-producing archipelago, if I can use the word "we" in that editorial sense.

It seems to me that these statements are a complete refutation of arguments made on the floor of this House by eminent gentlemen that the sugar industry can not affect us, as the sugar raisers there would never raise a sufficient quantity to seriously come in competition with our sugar interests.

If the lands in these islands are as described, and the sugar industry will be fostered and encouraged, as reliably asserted, and the production of sugar greatly increased, the conclusion seems irresistible that the cheapness of this commodity will in time greatly injure and finally destroy one of our greatest industries. If the Philippines can raise, manufacture, and export this product to our country cheaper than we can produce it—and testimony seems to bear out this conclusion—it stands to reason that their production of raw sugar, being nearly equal in quality, will finally capture our markets and thereby drive the American beet-sugar industry in this country out of business.

Let us look briefly for a moment at the cost of labor there. From a summary of commerce of the Philippine Islands, July, 1901, I find the following:

> One of the advantages possessed by the Filipino sugar planter is that he can hire help very cheaply. The average farm hand will work for 10 cents per day and board himself; native boys may be hired still cheaper.

General Robert P. Hughes, February 26, 1902, Senate Committee on the Philippines, page 535, says on this question:

> The ordinary wages, if paid regularly and promptly, which seems to satisfy the native, was 1 peso a week, a peso being 50 cents of our money.

Could our laboring men live on this miserable stipend?

I could, in addition to the quotations already made on this important feature of this question, add others, which would only burden my remarks and serve no particular purpose.

But these authoritative statements, however, are sufficient to clearly demonstrate that cheap labor (mainly the cost of the production of sugar) would come into free competition with our own intelligent, well-paid labor engaged in this enterprise.

For one I shall stand forever against the underpaid labor of other countries if by any means it can come into competition with our own. This is a most important question, a serious one, that will affect hundreds and thousands of good, honest laboring men and farmers who are thriving on our beet-sugar factories.

To-day we have fifty-four American beet-sugar establishments in Ohio, New York, Illinois, Wisconsin, Minnesota, Kansas, Nebraska, Wyoming, Montana, Michigan, and other States.

In 1905 over 100,000 farmers in these States supplied these factories with about 2,800,000 tons of beets, for which they received about $15,000,000. Shall we forget the American farmer? Is it wise to endanger the prosperity of these men? The beet-sugar industry really commenced its march of progress after the passage of the Dingley bill. When it became a law there were only a few factories in the country, chiefly located in the far West. Then we only produced 40,000 tons of beet sugar; to-day we produce over 300,000 tons. A splendid industry has been developing within our own domains. The experimental stage has passed. Forty millions of American capital has bravely invested in this new enterprise, thousands of farmers and laboring men in our country are reaping rich rewards from it, and the promise of its further development shines bright indeed if it were not shadowed for the moment by the threatened destruction portended by the passage of this bill. Republicans, we are in control and our principles are to be put to the test. An American industry asks for protection. Will we as protectionists withhold it? [Loud applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] is recognized for forty-five minutes.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. Chairman, we have heard much talk in this Chamber during this discussion of our duty to the Philippines, and before entering upon the real question before us I want to refer briefly to some things that have been said along that line. I want to most earnestly protest against the proposition that those who are not in favor of this bill are not just as dilligent and as honest and conscientious in the full performance of their duty to the Philippines as any other class of people in our country. It has become common by those who have argued in favor of this bill to express a sentiment which virtually means that those who oppose the bill are not in favor of doing our duty to those people who are now under our charge.

I want to say, gentlemen, that if I believed we were in honor bound to give any particular legislation to the Philippines, and believed that legislation would injure us, I would still favor it if honor demanded and necessity required it. But, gentlemen, there is no intimation further from the truth than that those who are opposed to this bill do not want to do justice to the Filipino. An expression used by the gentleman from California just a few moments ago well illustrates this argument. He said "taxation without representation is tyranny," a sentiment that appeals to all Americans, and one that we do not deny, and which always brings forth applause from those who are favoring this bill. Well, sir, what is the proposition? If you carry it out to its full extent and continue to control the Philippine Islands, then, sir, you have no right to tax them in any way, but must tax ourselves here and send the money over there to run their government. Would this not follow? More than that, this bill does not relieve them of taxation, but it recognizes that the revenues now raised under the present law must be raised under some other law or some other method in the Philippine Islands, and nobody denies but what some other law providing for taxatio there must be passed. Then they will still have taxation without representation, and there is your tyranny the same as ever. Again, Mr. Chairman, if it is true that we have no moral right to tax the imports from that country, then what have we been doing all these years? Then what do the advocates of this bill propose to do within the next three years before the tariff is all taken off—continue this tyranny? If this tax is tyranny, then the advocates of this bill are condemned as guilty by their own argument.

Why, their argument answers itself. It falls flat and shows that when you consider it rightly there is no reason behind their argument, and all this fine talk and eloquence to the effect that we are not treating the Filipino right and that we do not propose to treat him right is for the purpose of creating sentiment for the passage of this bill. Why, sir, what have we done for the Filipinos? We found them bound down to the earth by three hundred years of Spanish tyranny. We have wrested them from the yoke. We have given them freedom. We have educated their children. We have built railroads. We found them ignorant, and we are educating them. We have made capital and life safe there. We have established courts of justice. We found them uninstructed in self-government, and we are now giving them instructions in self-government. We found their cities filthy and disease everywhere prevalent. We have driven away fevers and disease, inaugurated systems of sanitation that have made them clean and modern. Aye, sir, we have done more. Many of the lives of our brave boys have been blotted out and their blood spilled on Philippine soil in the fight we made for humanity and the liberation of the Filipino. In thousands of American homes to-day there are vacant chairs—silent emblems of American sacrifice for Filipino liberty. Moreover, Congress has permitted them to tax goods coming in there from our country the same as goods from the rest of the world, while we give them a preferential duty here on their goods and turn all the money over to them. Have we not done enough? Why, sir, if we did give them this legislation, as I will show later from the arguments of the advocates, it would give them no relief, if relief they must have.

Now, it is well to consider, to begin with, that under the present law all the revenue we collect from imports from the Philippine Islands is turned back into their treasury. If this law is passed, in three years money to run the Government there must be raised in some other way. Ever since we have held them we have never profited one penny, but have given out much of our money and many precious lives for their advancement. Thousands of American citizens are engaged there to-day teaching their children the lessons of liberty and the morality of an honest life. We are giving them an education and preparing them for self-government.

There are two propositions in this question. First, would this legislation benefit the Filipino? Second, would it injure any industry in the United States? If it would not benefit the Filipinos, then there is no use in its passage. If it would injure any industry in the United States, then it should not be passed unless we are bound on a question of honor to pass it. I want to consider those propositions in their order.

First. Would it benefit the Filipino? Now, we have heard on that proposition two leading speeches, one on the question of sugar and one on the question of tobacco, coming from two of the leading members of the Ways and Means Committee; and we listened with a great deal of interest to the arguments made by those two gentlemen. But I want to submit to you, gentlemen, now, taking up the speech of the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. HILL] on tobacco, that if he established anything at all he certainly established the fact that under no consideration would there ever be a market for Philippine tobacco in America. Nobody, he said, would smoke these cigars if they came here, and nobody would try more than one. There would be no one here who would use their tobacco. If that be true, gentlemen, then I submit, what is the use of this law so far as tobacco is concerned?

And the gentleman from New York, the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means, spent three hours, and he summed up his whole speech in a nutshell in answer to a question that was asked him, and that was to the effect that it would not do the Filipino any good on the sugar proposition. He said, "I am doubtful about the benefit to the Filipinos." That is an admission, as lawyers would say, of a party in interest as against his interest, and ought to be taken in the strongest of terms. "I am doubtful," says the chairman, "of any benefit to the Filipinos." And then, when pressed further by other questions, he said: "It will give them courage. There is some sentiment in it. They believe it will help them." These are the reasons given by the chairman of the committee for the passage of this measure.

Let us take them up. In the first place, it would do him no good. Start with that admission. It will not help the poor Filipino. But he says, "They want this legislation, and therefore we ought to vote for it."

Now, in answer to that we might say that the same Filipino wants independence. Why do you not give it to him? You want us to vote as he directs and yet you admit he is not of sufficient intelligence to govern himself. Is it a sentiment that ought to control us here? Why, if it is there is a sentiment in the Philippine Islands in favor of independence, and why do you not give it to them? There is a sentiment over here on the Democratic side to cut loose from them. Why do you not respect that? It ought to be entitled to as much weight as a sentiment concerning the Philippines, especially from men, leaders on this side, who are joining hands with the Democrats in advocating this measure. [Applause.] "It will give him courage." How long will he have it? Not much longer than the time when he finds out that he has been deceived. If it will not do the Filipino any good, why can we not as men stand up and tell him so, and refuse to follow the deception that must be contained in the legislation that gives him an erroneous idea as to what is coming to him as a benefit? Gentlemen, this sentiment—and I will admit there is a sentiment for it—but this sentiment should not control us, because when we examine it we will find it is a false sentiment—an artificial sentiment, a manufactured sentiment. Any sentiment that brings as a result of carrying it out deception to any people is a sentiment that should not control us in our legislation. Why, there are other sentiments that you same leaders do not pretend to respect. There is a sentiment among the beet-sugar people that we ought to have protection. Why do you not respect that? There is a sentiment of the Filipino against it. There is one sentiment against the other, one for the Filipino and one for the American. The Filipino wants this law and the beet-sugar men do not want it. So there you are even again, but on one side is an American sentiment and on the other side is the Filipino sentiment; and the American, according to the leaders on this side and the unanimous consent almost of the other side, must kick the beam in the unjust scale in which the advocates of this measure insist that the weighing shall be done.

I protest against it. It is not just; it is not fair; it is un-American. Why, sir, there is a sentiment down in Arizona and in New Mexico for single statehood; almost unanimously all the people down there are in favor of single statehood. Why do you throttle them in this Congress and refuse to follow their wishes and sentiments, and at the same time, when you find the Filipino has a sentiment and wish, that you carry out all he desires? [Applause.]

Why, sir, there is a sentiment all over this House that we ought to have a public-building bill. There is a sentiment all over the United States for it, and our people are anxious to have it. Why not heed this sentiment coming from your own flesh and blood? Can it be possible that American wishes and American sentiment do not have as much consideration as is given to the sentiment and wishes of the people of a foreign country? I presume in order for us to get any heed from our leaders here we must first throw away our clothing, learn to talk Tagalog, dress ourselves in a tropical smile and the fig-leaf garment of the Filipino, and then we will be entitled to consideration. [Laughter and applause.]

I believe this sentiment will vanish into thin air when it is discovered that through this bill the Filipino can receive no benefit and an American industry will be injured. It will vanish into thin air when it is discovered that the beneficiary of this proposed legislation will be the sugar trust. A candid consideration of it can lead to no other conclusion and can lead to no other result.

Thus far I have considered this question upon the admissions that have been made by the advocates of the bill; and those admissions are sufficient to defeat the bill because they leave it without any reason or foundation on which to stand. But let us consider it further. In the first place, beet sugar is manufactured in a different way from cane sugar. The sugar coming from the Philippine Islands will be cane sugar. It will come here as raw sugar and will have to be refined before it is fit for consumption, and we all know that there is but one purchaser here, practically one purchaser of raw sugar in the United States, and that is the sugar trust. So that when the Filipino comes here with his sugar he will find but one purchaser in America for it. Now, the prices of sugar vary, and the duties vary according to the grade of the sugar. I want to give you an illustration, and for the purposes of this illustration I am going to use figures, dropping the fractions, because if I used the real figures it would run into fractions. Let us see; for the purpose of illustration we will say that sugar is worth 3 cents a pound in the world's market, that the American price here is 4, and that the tariff is 1 cent. Now, the little Filipino gets this bill passed, and in the delight of his glad heart he ships his sugar to America. He comes here expecting to sell it in our market and get 4 cents a pound; but when he lands he finds the sugar trust the only bidder. The beet-sugar men can not buy it for they have no means of refining it. The beet-sugar men can not use it in their factories and refine it. All refineries, as you know, are owned by the sugar trust. So that there is only one purchaser, the sugar trust, and it says: "Why, sir, you know that 3 cents a pound is the world's market; I will give you 3.1 cents for it;" and he can not get any other price, and must sell to him. The result is that the benefit will go to the sugar trust, and the Filipino, if he gets anything, will get a small fraction of a cent a hundred pounds above the world's market, so small that it will practically amount to nothing to the Filipino.

But I wonder what the poor little Filipino would think if he could be here in the American Congress and hear these philanthropic guardians of his explaining to the American Congress that really after all it would not give him any benefit. Do you suppose he will have a keener feeling for the people of the great American Government when he discovers that deception? He will discover eventually that we have used him, the Filipino, as a stool pigeon, and that while we are using him as a stool pigeon we are making a contribution to the sugar trusts. We are giving him a gold brick, and while he is innocently picking at the gilt on the outside and discovering the deception on the inside the sugar trust walks away with the swag and the Filipino is holding the sack. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Will the gentleman from Nebraska yield to a question?

Mr. NORRIS. Certainly.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. The gentleman has no doubt listened to the applause on the Democratic side, applauding his statement that the sugar trust would be the beneficiary of this reduction in the tariff on sugar?

Mr. NORRIS. Yes; I heard the applause, but it did not come from the Democratic side.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Now, I ask my friend if he does not believe that the Democratic party on the floor of this House would likewise applaud the opposite statement that the tariff builds up trusts in this country?

Mr. NORRIS. Is that all your question?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Yes.

Mr. NORRIS. I am sure I can not answer for the Democratic party. My argument is that free trade provided for in this bill will build up the sugar trust.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. The Democrats have just applauded the sentiments of the gentleman from Nebraska that free trade in sugar with the Philippines will build up the sugar trust.

Mr. NORRIS. If the gentleman will remember, the applause came from the first section of seats on the left of the center aisle. He has forgotten that that is now a part of the Republican side. [Laughter.]

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Nebraska yield to the gentleman from Missouri?

Mr. NORRIS. Yes; with pleasure.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I wanted to ask the gentleman from Kansas a question.

Mr. NORRIS. I do not want to yield for that purpose. If the gentleman wanted to ask me a question, I would yield; but, I beg the gentleman's pardon, as my time is very limited, I do not want to yield for the purpose of allowing him to ask another gentleman a question in my time.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. All right.

Mr. MONDELL. I want to ask the gentleman if it is not true and if it was not stated by men qualified to know of such things—and the statement has not been denied—that in the reduction of the duty to Cuba the Cuban has received in the markets of the United States about one-third of that reduction, the balance going to the sugar trust?

Mr. NORRIS. Yes; it is a historical fact. The sugar trust has reaped the largest share of benefit from that legislation, just as it will on sugar from the Philippines if this free-trade measure is passed. It is admitted, too, by the advocates of the bill—in fact, by everybody—that the bill will not result in reducing the price of sugar to the consumer.

Mr. SCOTT. I should like to ask the gentleman one question for information.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Nebraska yield to the gentleman from Kansas?

Mr. NORRIS. Yes.

Mr. SCOTT. If the effect of this bill is to give the sugar trust the profits on Philippine sugar, I should like to inquire how the gentleman argues that the passage of this bill will stimulate the production of Philippine sugar to such an extent as to make it a menace to the industry in this country?

Mr. NORRIS. I have not argued that as yet. I expect to do it, however, in the proper place, and probably when I do it the gentleman will be enlightened if he is now in darkness.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I want to say right here that in my judgment this bill is not properly named. It ought to be entitled "An act for the purpose of deceiving the Filipino, for menacing an American industry, and for the enrichment of the sugar trust." [Applause.]

We come now to my second proposition: Will this legislation injure any American industry?

What are the possibilities of the Philippine Islands in raising sugar? It has been repeatedly said that from the testimony before the committee we could prove anything. That may be true. I confess that I am rather led to that belief, and it strikes me that inasmuch as that is true, that makes a sufficient case why men with money would not want to put it into a sugar factory. Let us see what Governor Taft said in 1902, when he was before the committee. Mr. Moody asked this question, referring to the Philippine Islands:

Are the islands, in respect to soil and climate and labor conditions, capable of indefinite expansion along the lines of the production of sugar?

Governor TAFT. Yes, sir.

Mr. MOODY. So that it is another place where the sugar of the world can be produced?

Governor TAFT. Yes; I have no doubt that there is enough there, if the sugar were properly cultivated, to raise—well, I do not know how much Cuba can raise—but if conditions favor it we are going to be a great sugar-producing archipelago.

Mr. HITT asked him this question:

It is said by experts on the Hawaiian, Philippine, and Cuban lands that the Philippine lands are as good as the Cuban lands.

Governor TAFT. Yes, sir.

Now, there was Governor Wright, in the same year, testifying before another committee. Senator BURROWS asked him:

If that cheap labor were admitted—

Speaking of the admission of Chinese labor to the Philippine Islands—to what extent might that industry be developed?

Governor Wright said:

Oh, indefinitely. The islands are very rich, and both climate and soil favor the production of sugar on a large scale. There is no doubt about that.

Senator DUBOIS. Do you know how much sugar they can produce per acre as compared, we will say, with Hawaii?

Governor WRIGHT. By the same methods of intensive farming as are used in Hawaii?

Senator DUBOIS. Yes.

Governor WRIGHT. I should say they would produce as much. I am inclined to think the soil in the Philippines is fully as good, and probably better.

And in Hawaii they produce 5 tons of sugar to the acre.

Now, gentlemen, let us look at this from the investor's standpoint. Suppose you were going to invest money in a beet-sugar factory. You would consider this testimony given by these men who are there on that island and in control of it and who ought to know and who, perhaps, did know. It is true they tell a different story now, but there is a different proposition up now, and they have, perhaps, honestly changed their opinions in regard to the beet proposition. But still there is no man who tells it with any certainty. What would the investor find? He would find, in addition to this, that history shows that since we had free sugar from Hawaii the production in that country increased 350 per cent; he would find in the short time we have had reduced rates on sugar from Cuba the production has increased nearly 100 per cent; he would find in the few years we have had free trade in sugar from Porto Rico that the production has increased almost 100 per cent—an average increase in the three places of 1,200 per cent. And, my friends, the possibility of raising sugar in Cuba has not anywhere near been reached, and we all know it.

Now, I do not claim to have any personal knowledge, but I submit, gentlemen, the investor would take all this into consideration. What more would he do? He would refer to the Republican platform in 1896, which said:

The Republican party favors such protection as will lead to the production on American soil of all the sugar which the American people use, and for which they pay other countries more than $100,000,000 annually.

At the end of the next four years the Republican platform was again indorsed. The investor would look to them and say, "What has this party done to keep its pledge?" He would have heard Governor Taft testify and he would have heard Governor Wright testify, and he would have said in the face of that, "Why, there may be enough of that sugar to wipe me off from the face of the earth." He would have heard the argument of the gentleman from New York, the chairman of the Ways and Means Committee, when we were considering the Porto Rico bill, and he would have heard the gentleman from Pennsylvania on that occasion, when they both claimed that under no circumstances should we ever have free trade with the Philippine Islands. Then he would have seen them here on this bill turn a sommersault and explain away their former arguments and say that we must have free trade with the Philippine Islands. [Applause and laughter.]

After he had heard all that, what would he have said? He would have said, "It is a precarious proposition, and I will not invest my money in the beet-sugar industry." It is not necessary for us to show that it will absolutely ruin this business. It is necessary only to show that it is a reasonable proposition that it will menace it; that it will prevent men from putting their money into the business, and, because you or because I believe that it will not hurt the beet-sugar industry, a man who has the money, who believes it will, will not invest it, and as a result the industry will not be developed.

A man is just as dead who is scared to death as though he was killed with a revolver, and if you frighten the investor from going into the beet-sugar business you injure that business even though you might believe, as a matter of fact, that there would be no danger.

I am not one of those gentlemen who believe that this will necessarily absolutely ruin the sugar industry. I think it will have a tendency to prevent its development and will retard it, and the action already taken has retarded it. I was talking with a gentleman the other day, a Member of the House, and he told me that before he became a Member of the House, before the Cuban reciprocity measure was passed, he, with other gentlemen, formed a company and went over the Republican Valley in Nebraska and through Colorado with the view of establishing a series of beet-sugar factories in Nebraska and Colorado. But when Congress passed the law giving preferential duty to Cuban sugar, and it became evident that there was danger to this industry and that the American market was going to be destroyed they gave it up after they had spent a good deal of money and let it all go.

I happen to know that recently in my State there was a proposition to erect two beet-sugar factories, one at North Platte, Nebr., and another in the Republican Valley, and I am reliably informed that under present conditions those who were going to put money into it have, at least as far as one of them is concerned, given up the project. We can not expect men to put money into these things when they look over past history and see that Congress has taken away so much of the protection to this industry and is now threatening to take off more. Let the Republican party redeem its promise and protect this industry as it has others, and in ten years we will be producing all the sugar we consume. Improved methods in the cultivation of beets and their manufacture into sugar and competition between American factories will reduce the cost to the consumer. This has always been true of every industry that protection has built up. Our history affords many striking illustrations of it that I could mention if I had time. What we need is stability of policy. This wavering on our part will drive investors from the field.

Gentlemen, if we produced all the sugar we use, according to the way that the Republican platform proposed that we should, we would have invested more than $150,000,000 in machinery, there would be more than $100,000,000 invested in buildings, it would require more than 25,000,000 tons of beets, farmers would get more than $100,000,000 annually. Many millions would be spent for wages. There would be a million dollars spent for coal and for lime; and all this money would stay at home. There would be work for those who want to work on the farms, in the beet fields, and for those who work in the factories making machinery, and those who work in the beet factories. In my State there was one factory that spent last year $360,000 for beets; over $100,000 they paid for freight; more than $84,000 they paid for labor in the factory, besides the annual pay roll that they kept the year round. They used more than 20,000 tons of coal, 12,000 tons of lime, 175,000 tons of coke, 300,000 filter bags, besides a large amount of other material.

If this industry were properly nourished and established, the farmers would have a better market, the manufacturers would have a better business. The contractor, the carpenter, the coal miner, the weaver, the coke burner, the quarryman, thousands of boys and girls in the beet fields, and sewing girls in the factories would have employment on account of this industry. Gentlemen, as Republicans and protectionists, we owe it to the country. I was amused at the gentleman from Pennsylvania in his very able speech referring to the sugar lands in Louisiana and then to the sugar lands in some of the Western States, when he said there is enough sugar land to produce all the beets for sugar to supply all our needs. Why, yes, that is true. Let us turn the argument.

Why, there is enough iron ore in the bowels of the earth in the State of Pennsylvania to supply us with all the steel and all the iron and manufactured products, or both of them, that we will need. Shall we therefore ask for free trade? Why, he says, they are improving the method of cultivation of beets and extracting the sugar. That is true. Is that an argument for free trade? Why, I read the other day of a new invention that was made to improve the manufacture of nuts and screws in the home city of the gentleman from Pennsylvania. Why would not that be a good argument to say that we should have free trade in regard to those articles if it applies to this? The idea from a protectionist's standpoint has always been that where we have the facilities here for the manufacture of any product it is our duty to protect it against foreign importation until it can be built up to such an extent that it will supply all our demands, and it has always been the history of protection that eventually it cheapens the product to the consumer. In other words, it sets to work the ingenious Yankee mind, and new inventions are made to cheapen the process. It would be that way with sugar. It would not be long until the method of cultivation would be improved, until the method of manufacture would be improved; but you can not expect the American mind to work on these propositions unless you establish the industry and give occasion and opportunity for the mind to work.

Mr. Chairman, I want to refer now to a report here containing the views of the minority of the Ways and Means Committee. The Democratic minority say, in their report, this:

So long as we retain them—

Referring to the Philippine Islands—

we favor the establishment and maintenance of free trade betwixt them and the United States.

Then they offer a substitute to give that free trade immediately. You know this measure that is introduced does not give that for three years, and the Democrats want to make the thrust all at once and the Republican leaders want to kill the industry by degrees. That is the difference in the two reports. Then the Democrats say, in conclusion:

If the substitute herein proposed is voted down, we will support House bill 3—

being reported by the majority on the principle that it is a long step in the logical and right direction.

That is, a long step and right step for free trade. That is what they mean, that is what they say. Is not that a sweet morsel for the Republicans to swallow? Is not it a peculiar situation here to-day that we find the leaders of the Republican side united with the leaders of the Democratic side in one grand rush toward free trade? Why, I can not understand that except on that condition the Republican leaders, having studied this Filipino question somewhat, have become so imbued with this sentiment in favor of the Filipino and having come back from the Philippine Islands on that trip with hearts bleeding with mercy and having seen the Democratic host here scattered to the four winds of heaven, running in all directions without a home and without a place to stay, in their philanthropy for the Filipino they thought they would do a little philanthropic work among the Democrats and went over there with them. Why, sir, the gentleman from Pennsylvania said something about Chinese labor. I want to speak of that for a moment. The Chinese labor they say now will never be allowed in the Philippine Islands, but the investors will say, "You told us once you would never give free trade; you misled us once in your platform saying we should have protection; you said on the floor of the House we should never have free trade; now you say that because a Filipino wants it and there is a sentiment in favor of it you want them to have it."

In the face of this past history the investor would say: "We do not believe you when you say you will not let John Chinaman in." Everybody agrees that if the Chinaman is admitted into the Philippine Islands that then it will be a menace, that then it will interfere with our industry here at home. Governor Wright's testimony on that point in undisputed. Why, gentlemen, what would be necessary to change these leaders over and have them at the next Congress ask that the exclusion law be amended and the Chinaman let into the Philippine Islands? Only this: In the first place, we would have to have the Filipino ask for it, and in the next place, we would have to have the sugar trust create in some way a sentiment in favor of it as they have done for this bill. Gentlemen, I believe that John Chinaman is going to be the next beneficiary of the tender-hearted philanthropists who are advocating the passage of this bill. Now, as to that sentiment. I recognize the fact that there is some sentiment in favor of it, but I believe, even if it meant the end of political life, it would not pay us to follow sentiment that leads us to no other conclusion than that the legislation will not only injure America, but it will deceive the Filipinos and enrich the sugar trust. Official life is not so sweet that it must be purchased at the sacrifice of principle. As for me, I had rather go to my political grave here and now, wrapped in the cloak of a satisfied conscience, than to live forever in public life knowing and feeling I had violated a principle that in my heart I believed was righteous. [Applause.]

Gentlemen, all this will come home some day. The time will come, in my judgment, when we will regret taking this action. I am opposed to it because it is contrary to the teachings of the Republican party since its foundation. Democrats favor this bill because it is a free-trade measure. I am opposed to it because it violates the fundamental principle of protection, the very cornerstone of Republicanism. Protection has made our nation great, our people prosperous, and our children happy. It has built up our manufactures, established a market for all the products of the farm, and given an honest wage to those who toil. Under its benign influence the Republican party has led the country onward and forward until it stands among the nations of the earth without an equal, without a peer, and it is a satisfaction to every Republican that for the last forty years the history of our party has been the history of our country. Under that banner, sacred to the heart of every Republican, we have marched to many a victory and brought comfort and happiness to millions of humble homes. Strike it down now, and we turn our backs upon the policy that has made our country great and face a wilderness of desolation, ruin, and broken promises. Rally to its support. Redeem in good faith the pledges made in its name, and we will plant our banner, our country's flag, upon heights yet unscaled, there to forever wave as an emblem to all the world, of peace, prosperity, and honor. [Applause.]

Mr. GARRETT. Mr. Chairman, the matter which has given me the greatest concern in determining how I should vote upon the legislation now in issue is not the economic phase. The gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] has just asserted that the Democratic side of the House favors the proposed bill because it is a free-trade measure. I do not profess to be able to declare the reasons pursuading my colleagues on this side the Chamber, but, speaking for myself, I beg to say that that is not the reason which induces me to support it. The controlling, the important reason operating upon me is what I conceive to be the legal obligation which we owe the Philippine Islands, growing out of our legal relations with them. The question which has given me most concern is this, What effect will this legislation have upon our constitutional or governmental connection with them? How will this legislation be construed as applied to the question, "What shall we do with them?" The legal status of our relations with those lands and that people has been from the beginning, and remains, exceedingly chaotic. The adjudications of the Supreme Court have by no means clarified all the legal issues growing out of our acquisition and control of those lands. There are those (and they are not a few) who declare their belief that our stay there is to be permanent. There are others (and if a vote could be had upon that question alone, it is believed that they would prove to be the majority) who think that the day will come when our own interests, the interests of that people, and all circumstances and conditions combined will present a demand which can not go unheeded, that we in some honorable way give over such sovereign powers and rights as we now possess and exercise there. I belong, Mr. Chairman, to the latter class. This is no time to present the reasons for that belief. I may be mistaken, but whether I am or not I do concede that when the time comes for that question to be acted upon by the legislative power of the United States the discussion of it will consist of legal arguments as profound and luminous as any arguments that have been occasioned by any question in the history of this country or in the history of the whole world.

The question of whether this Government can voluntarily surrender sovereignty over lands possession of which has been acquired as was the possession of the Philippine Islands will present an issue which will strike from the genius of the future flames that will illumine American intellectual skies. I shall certainly not try to go into the refinements of that question now, for it is replete with refinements and ramifications, and one, without making fuller preparation than I have had opportunity to make, would soon be floundering did he endeavor to discuss it. But if I believed, Mr. Chairman, that the passage of the legislation proposed in the minority and majority bills now in issue here would, when added to the previous legislation in connection with the Philippines, constitute such an admission in law and such an assumption of authority or responsibility as that it would add to the legal or constitutional difficulties of disposing of or dispensing with those islands in the future, as justice and safety and security for them and us shall dictate, I would not support it. Being convinced, however, that such will not be the result, after considering it as carefully as I could, I shall support the minority bill and, if that be defeated, shall then vote for the majority measure, provided, of course, it remains as it now is. I reserve the right, should it be amended, to vote upon it as may then appear proper and just.

It has been suggested, however, that those who believe this Government has no constitutional right to levy a tariff on the products of the Philippine Islands can not consistently support the majority bill, for the reason, as they insist, it does impose a tariff. Let us consider that phase for a moment. But first let me say that while I have had no legislative experience I have long known that the practical legislator must frequently be content with less than he would like to have; that he is constantly put to the choice between two courses, both of which are unsatisfactory.

I have yet to learn that under such circumstances he ought to choose the greater of the two evils. If I should concede, which I do not concede, that in voting for the majority bill I asquiesce in levying a tariff between the Philippines and the United States, what, it may be asked, do those who vote against the measure accept? We must look to the parliamentary situation in which we are placed and the results which our votes will accomplish or are intended to accomplish. What is to be our parliamentary situation? With the minority bill voted down the question will recur upon the bill presented by the majority. The majority bill repeals all tariff duties except upon two articles, sugar and tobacco, immediately. It lowers the rate on these two articles to 25 per cent of the rates now fixed by what is known as the "Dingley law," provides that this 25 per cent shall be collected until April 11, 1909, and that then these two articles shall go upon the free list and absolute free trade be established. To pass that bill enacts that very status of affairs. To vote for it is to help pass it. To defeat that bill leaves the present rates in full force, with no provision for them to ever change or cease. To vote against the bill is, of course, to help in its defeat and bring about the continuation of the rates now levied. For my own part, even on the basis of consenting to the principle of levying the tariff, I could still, in the parliamentary situation in which we shall be placed, support the bill and justify it, at least to myself, on the ground of its being the choice of the lesser evil.

But to revert to the main question, I do not concede, as I have stated, that to vote for the majority bill is to accept or acquiesce in the principle. The majority bill is not initiative legislation. It is a repeal of existing law. The minority measure proposes immediate free trade as to all articles passing between the respective countries. The majority measure proposes immediate free trade as to all except two of these articles and ultimate free trade as to these. The only difference between them is in point of time as to when the law shall take effect as to tobacco and sugar. There is no difference in principle. It is not infrequent in legislation to provide that certain acts passed shall take effect, not from and after their passage, but at the expiration of certain periods, months, or even years, ahead, and I have yet to hear of any gentleman successfully demonstrating that such violate organic law simply and solely on account of the fact that the beginning of their operation is postponed.

A great deal has been said here of a partisan character during the discussion of this bill. If the principle involved in it, Mr. Chairman, is to be tested by party declarations and practices it would hardly be disputed—could not be successfully challenged—that it is fundamentally a Democratic principle; that the majority bill is a recognition in express terms of one of the elemental, academic principles which Democracy declares and has declared from the beginning must be recognized in our relations with those distant and burdensome lands.

We are frequently told, Mr. Chairman, that we will never again see the Democratic party triumphant at the elections. That is speculation to which I do not agree, of course, but it may be true. I may not live to see Democratic principles written into law by the Democratic party, but I do now see, and expect to see again during the life of this Congress, that which is next best—Democratic principles being written into law by the Republican party. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, whether admitted or not, the reasons which lead the Republican President and his party to the support of this measure is the realization, the decision of the Supreme Court to the contrary notwithstanding, that the Democratic position is right when it declares that any policy of levying a tariff on the products of those islands violates the spirit of the organic law. It is the realization that the anomalous condition presented by our present legal relations is a legal monstrosity and can not be continued without serious menace to the fundamental tenets of this Republic's life.

From the economic standpoint their only logical position is to oppose the bill. Every dictate of that selfishness which is the web and woof of the protective principle cries out against it. There is no argument offered against it by the Republicans opposing it which is not based upon the insistence that it is the duty of the Government to prostitute its powerful taxing function to selfish ends. Even those Republicans who support it have, with one or two conspicuous exceptions, devoted the greater portion of their time to the effort to show that its passage will not injure the special interests which they have pampered by legislative manipulation and taught to rely upon governmental favoritism.

But, as I have said, Mr. Chairman, the economic principle involved has not been the controlling one with me. I have looked to the other, the essentially and fundamentally Democratic principle which lies beneath the measure and which constitutes the foundation upon which it is grounded. I shall not withhold my support from that principle simply because its application happens to be proposed from the side of the opposite party. We will not desert our children because we find them kidnaped and in the hands of strangers. Rather will we love them and cherish them the more and seek to contribute to their growth and health and comfort.

Considering it from the economic standpoint, there is this to be said: If it shall destroy or injure the beet-sugar interests, those splendid American farmers, heroic and self-reliant, as American farmers are and ought to be, will sow their lands to wheat, or corn, or rye, or oats, or alfalfa, or some other crop to which the soil is adapted, and continue to live just the same and just as well. Why, sir, if men go out of one business, they who are worth the while will go into another. In the great scheme of nature nothing is lost and all things balance in the end. Production in its general phases is modified and affected only by the units of labor that are engaged all over the world. We talk a great deal and we hear a great deal about labor-saving machinery; but that, after all, is but a relative term. Generally speaking, we have no labor-saving machinery. On a trip to Mount Vernon a few days ago I observed a steam shovel at work. It dug great masses of dirt at a single plunge and flung it from side to side at a single turn. Quite naturally one thinks of the labor it saves; and yet, when you come to look back of that machine to its constituent parts, when you come to sum up the energy which was exerted to construct it, the forces that were exercised in bringing the timber from the forest and the metal from the mines—when you trace the implements by which its parts were formed and fashioned to the almost infinite ends—you find that the units of labor engaged in its construction added to the units of labor engaged in its operation balance exactly with the units of labor that would have had to be exercised to remove that dirt had the steam shovel never been invented.

I do not seek to decry labor-saving machinery, of course. I seek only to illustrate the principle that units of labor constitute the basis and measure of production. If left to move along natural lines without let or hindrance, legislative or otherwise, this natural law will itself work out a full, fair, and permanent development. When by artificial means you disturb the natural operations of this law, when by artificial means you interfere with its action and natural function and build up an industry or an enterprise despite it, you have but diverted units of labor from a natural to an unnatural field, and you have contributed nothing to human happiness, the chief aim of man, nor have you contributed, on the whole, to the production of a greater amount of wealth than would have followed the silent, steady movement of this great economic law. More than that, when you have created industries by buttressing them with legislation you have placed them upon an artificial basis. Their growth is artificial, their strength is abnormal, they are sensitive to every breeze that blows, and all the while you have performed the work at the expense of some industry which would have been naturally strong and powerful and grounded upon a sure, safe, sound basis. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. Chairman, the discussion of the economic phase of the measure before the House leads naturally into a larger field than the measure itself occupies. If, therefore, I seem to be taking a wider range than the exact issue before us involves, it can hardly be deemed improper, and I might plead the precedents set during the discussion of the measure during the last few days as justifying the action. Of course, my time is nearly exhausted and I can not continue much longer, but I should like to state, without elaboration, some conditions that seem to be worthy of attention by legislators of this country just now, certain circumstances which elicit consideration and which are challenging action in the way of general tariff revision, at least, if not pointing ultimately to a purely revenue tariff law. I am seeking to avoid as much as possible the restatement of propositions purely academic.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman be allowed to conclude his remarks.

Mr. GARRETT. I think five mintues will be sufficient.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair ought, perhaps, to say, in justice to other gentlemen that the time from now until 5 o'clock Monday afternoon, when debate must close, has all been spoken for, and two other gentlemen desire to make short speeches this evening.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. We can run over five minutes. I ask unanimous consent for five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri asks that the time of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GARRETT] be extended for five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. GARRETT. I thank the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CLARK] for his courtesy and the committee for its kindness.

These conditions are at least four in number. Dividing them thus, the first is the conviction, growing steadily in the public mind, that the time has come to make good the promises and pledges of those who advocated a protective tariff as a shelter for industries during the early stages of their existence—"protection to infant industries"—with the promise expressed in many instances and implied in all that after the infancy stage had been passed the rights of the consumers of the country would receive attention and consideration. With the greater manufacturing industries developed to the point where their accumulations are almost infinitely more than the aggregate accumulations of the laborers who toil in their employ, the laborers themselves, being consumers, are beginning to feel that the Government ought to realize that the swaddling clothes have been taken off and that the industries no longer need governmental aid for subsistence or even to insure reasonable profits.

The second condition is that which has resulted from the development and growth of the organizations and combinations commonly called the trusts, so many of which have confessedly grown almost wholly by reason of the tariff schedules based upon the protective idea.

The third condition grows out of the second. It is that of the lack of competition to lower prices. No more forcible argument will be found interwoven in the speeches of those advocating protection in the early days of its development than the answer they endeavored to make to the assertions of those opposing it that the adoption of the policy would increase prices to the consumers. Their answer was that when home manufactories and enterprises had been developed competition between them would ensue, which would result in lowering prices to the consumer. The exact opposite has proven to be the case. Instead of competing there has been combination and, with foreign competition shut out by the high-tariff duties, they have been enabled by this combination to hold up prices of commodities, charging for them the cost of manufacture plus the tariff duty, no matter how much above a reasonable profit this duty might enable them to secure. The law of supply and demand has not been entirely repealed by them perhaps, but its operations have been greatly modified, so the consumer is left wholly without that relief so vociferously and with such apparent sincerity promised or predicted through internal competition.

Another circumstance, and probably for practical results the most important of all, is the realization that we must very, very soon begin to search for new markets, or else many of the developed industries of this country will become antiquated and useless, and it will be necessary to abandon such entirely or greatly curtail their output. Each generation develops the enterprises made peculiarly necessary by the stage of that generation's growth, such as will contribute to the demands and necessities of it. So many of the industries developed in one generation are not required by the succeeding generation in the particular country where they are developed. It results, accordingly, that such enterprises, if they would continue, must look to another people who are in just that stage of growth where their productions are needed. This law is, generally speaking, true as to many enterprises. Proof of it may be found in the growing demands by many industries of our country, whose output of products has not been increased, for foreign markets. Reciprocal trade relations with various countries would contribute tremendously to the prosperity of very many of our leading enterprises.

Perhaps, taking it all in all, there is no nation with whom it is so important that we establish reciprocal commercial understandings and intercourse as with the Dominion of Canada. It was a shortsighted policy which did not look there and work there years and years ago. That land affords the most fruitful field for us of any section of the earth to-day, and they would give us in return benefits as great as we would give them. It is not necessary to surrender the protectionist theory even to favor this. Both protectionists and those who believe in a tariff for revenue only alike declare that the circumstance which has contributed most to our growth and prosperity has been the immense internal territory of the United States, peopled by an active, industrious, virile folk, among all of whom and all of whose industries and enterprises there has been absolute freedom of intercourse and exchange. The free-trade home market has confessedly been the source of our commercial strength and development. Would it not be rendered greater still by increasing that free-trade zone? Is this not particularly true if the increase is to be had by establishing such relations with Canada as will include her in the extension? Consider that splendid domain, its resources, its almost untapped fertility, its magnificent forests, its broad expanse of agricultural lands, its mineral wealth, its fisheries. Why, sir, it has possibilities almost as prodigious as our realties. It is just now getting really started in its development. It is to pass within the next quarter of a century through that growth that has been ours for the last twenty-five years. The very industries developed here to supply the demands of our people during that time and many of which have now been, or will soon be, outgrown by us could, had a wise policy been instituted, have turned to Canada and found a market there for those very things. Above all matters, too, sir, consider the people of Canada, a magnificent people, like us in lineage and blood, cosmopolitan, virile, vigorous, brave, intelligent, living in a climate favorable to the highest development of physical and mental powers. It is a people capable of daring and doing all the bold and masterful things that humanity can accomplish. Think of what we could be to one another, of what we could give them that they need, and of what they could return for our foods and fruits and wheels. We may have waited too long already, but at least, sir, it is not too late to try to undo the wrong which inattention has brought about.

It has been insisted that we must hold the Philippines in order to develop an oriental trade. I have never believed that and do not now. At the same time I do not think the possibilities of an oriental or eastern trade are to be passed over lightly. I have thought it was not an idle dream that out of the development which is to come in Siberia there might accrue new opportunities to American markets, but, sir, those possibilities are infinitesimal when compared with what might have been ours in Canada, with what possibly might, by a wise policy, still be ours there. Those of us who represent cotton-growing sections would be glad indeed to see such relations established with China as that her markets could be opened to cotton as well as all other products from this country. Cotton is specifically mentioned because it is probably that product of which we might hope to sell most to China. We need expect but little trade with Japan. Japan will buy one of our machines for a model and will proceed rapidly to duplicate it as often as they desire in their own factories. The development of Japan will hinder all other nations in trading with the Orient. We may hope for something there, but not for much. All the trade of the Orient that we may reasonably hope for during the next fifty years would not aggregate a sum worthy hardly of comparison with the trade which might have been, and perhaps might still be, ours right here at our home, with people whose blood is our blood and whose spirit is our spirit, who understand our business methods, and who work along the same general lines of business procedure, who do not have to be educated either to use our articles or to learn how to buy them—trade, I say, which might have been, and which might still be, opened to us by a liberal and sensible trade policy entered upon between this nation and that. [Applause.]

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, I am a good deal of a stalwart protectionist myself, but I say to you gentlemen of my own party that in Massachusetts there is a growing sentiment for the immediate revision of the tariff. Personally I do not find myself in sympathy with this declaration for immediate revision in the Massachusetts Republican State platform last year, as I am far from being convinced that under a general revision of the tariff Massachusetts would be likely to fare as well as she does under the Dingley Act. Likewise I am well aware that the country has never been more prosperous than under the present law.. Other of my delegation, including both Senators, are convinced that it is time for a general revision. The dean of our delegation [Mr. GILLETT] has done his very best in that direction against the sentiment of you gentlemen on the Republican side, only to be met with the reward of a venemous screech from the mugwump press of Boston. [Laughter.]

Mr. Chairman, while I do not agree with the declaration of my State platform that the time has come for general revision, and while I have the right to differ, because I was elected on the Republican national platform of 1904 and not on the State platform of 1905; nevertheless, my stand is not popular at home, and I realize that the sentiment for tariff revision in Massachusetts is strong. Roughly speaking, the economic lines which divided the Republican party from the Democratic party in Massachusetts down to 1896 were the lines between the producer on the one hand and the consumer and the mercantile interests of greater Boston on the other.

In 1896, to a large extent, those mercantile interests came over to the Republican side from apprehension at the attitude of the Democratic party. They have remained with us more or less ever since from the same cause. But whenever the tariff is the issue I believe that we shall find them tending to the Democracy. If the Republican party stands pat and the Democratic party is for tariff revision, they will be for tariff revision. If tariff revision is advocated by the Republican party and tariff for revenue only by the Democracy, they will favor tariff for revenue only. If tariff for revenue only is advocated by the Republican party and free trade by the Democracy, they will favor free trade. I expect them in the long run to align themselves with the party most opposed to protection. But now the opponents of the tariff have new allies in Massachusetts. That is what this House does not seem to realize, or, at all events, my side of the House.

They have been joined by a formidable following from the shoe industry, our largest interest with the exception of the combined textiles. Shoemakers think, I believe rightly, that they have a grievance. The average shoe manufacturers—and when I say the average I mean about 80 per cent of the manufacturers in Mr. ROBERTS's district, 80 per cent of the manufacturers in Mr. LOVERING's district, and 65 per cent of the manufacturers in my district, the three biggest shoe districts in the United States——

Mr. GROSVENOR. Or the world.

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts (continuing). Take this position: They say, We are Republicans. We have always been Republicans. We are protectionists; but to the dickens with your hide and leather schedule. [Laughter and applause.] They say, very properly and very truly—I am speaking of the large majority of them—that they do not care two snaps for the 25 per cent duty on their finished product because they are not afraid of external competition, whereas at the other end of the line they must pay considerably more for their sole leather in consequence of the existing schedule. You can argue with them until you are black in the face as to whether it is the farmer or the Chicago packer who gets the benefit of the 15 per cent duty on hides and the 20 per cent duty on sole leather, but you can not convince one of them that this tariff schedule is in his favor. He knows that it does not do him any good at one end and does him harm at the other. On the other hand there are in my district probably 35 per cent of the shoe manufacturers who make such a grade of shoes that they need protection from foreign competition. They are by no means wedded to the proposition for the exchange of free hides and free sole leather on one side and free boots and free shoes on the other, but I think a measure may be devised by which they can be satisfied.

I advocate the introduction of a rule for the consideration of the hide and leather schedule alone, amendments forbidden. If I thought that such a rule could be brought in, and I am not enough of a humbug to pretend that I think it likely, I should go before the Ways and Means Committee with a bill for free hides, free sole leather, and a duty of 10 cents per pair and 10 per cent ad valorem on boots and shoes. Shoemakers are not so unfair as to demand their raw material free without being prepared to make concessions on their finished product.

You gentlemen may very well object that the Republican caucus would hardly support such a rule. I grant that, and I know as well as you do that no such rule could be brought in without Republican caucus instruction. Nevertheless I also know as well as you do that such a rule would arouse far less opposition in the caucus than a rule for the consideration of a general tariff-revision bill.

Of course it is a very difficult problem, but it is well worth our serious consideration as a party. If I am correct, as I believe I am, in saying that dissatisfaction in the shoe industry is not to be denied, it is well worth our while to amend the hide and leather schedule independently of any general tariff revision. As I said before, I do not believe that under general revision Massachusetts would come out as well off as she is at present, but I admit that I differ from my delegation on that question. You may have observed that in this statement I couple free hides with free sole leather.

Free hides without free sole leather would probably not do us a particle of good. Possibly a small duty on sole leather would be tolerable, but 20 per cent would not be. Even if we have free hides, so long as we leave the sole-leather schedule where it is we probably benefit the shoe industry but little, if at all. This is not generally understood. The daily papers at home do not understand it, although the trade journals understand it perfectly well. The politicians on both sides are confused about it, but it is plain as daylight that the situation has changed within a year. Hitherto a manufacturer bought his sole leather where he chose. He could buy it from the American Hide and Leather Company, the so-called "sole-leather trust," or he could buy it from any one of the independent producers. Nobody cared whether the 20 per cent import duty was provided by law or not, because we were exporting sole leather, and there was plenty of internal competition. This year the Central Leather Company was formed, and I think I am correct in saying that the two gentlemen most instrumental in its formation were Mr. Armour and his brother-in-law, Mr. Valentine. You will observe that these gentlemen represent the very same interests that are supposed to control the so-called "beef trust," which, we claim, gets the benefit of the hide duty.

The packer hides for the most part, you understand, are the only hides that go into the soles of first-class shoes. Imported hides usually are made into red leather.

It looks to-day as if the Central Leather Company, by securing control of competitors, were likely in the future completely to master the whole sole-leather industry under the ægis of 20 per cent protection. If such proves to be the case, it is very easy to see that they will not care whether hides are free or not, because they manufacture their own hides into sole leather. Perhaps they may even prefer free hides. When they see fit they can import Argentine hides or any other kind that may be suitable for inferior classes of shoes, meanwhile keeping the price of sole leather where it is to-day. Whatever you may think about the hide duty, you must admit that a duty of 20 per cent on sole leather is indefensible. Not more than 5 or 6 per cent of the cost of a side of sole leather is labor cost. Our theory of protection to the American laborer is that the duty charged at our ports shall be the measure of the difference of wages paid in a given industry in the United States and the wages paid in the same industry abroad. I believe that a 5 per cent duty on sole leather would more than measure this difference and would cover the utmost possible protection needed by the American workmen engaged in the industry. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. WILLIAM W. KITCHIN. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask unanimous consent that the gentleman be allowed to proceed with his speech. He is making a very interesting statement.

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. In view of the fact that the additional time could only be granted at the expense of the time of the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. SCOTT], and considering that this request for unanimous consent comes from the Democratic side, I have an idea that perhaps I had better not acquiesce. [Laughter.]

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. Chairman, I recognize that it is a good deal of an imposition upon the good nature of the House to address it so late in the last hour of the last day of the week, but I beg to assure you that if you do me the honor to remain my gratitude shall be in proportion to your sacrifice. As a matter of fact, when this debate began I had no expectation of asking the privilege of participating in it. Although I was a member of the Congressional party which visited the Philippines last summer and spent several weeks in rather careful study of the questions involved in the bill we are now considering, I felt that the discussion properly belonged with the members of that great committee which has been studying these questions in one phase or another for more than four years. And I do not rise now because I feel that the distinguished and able members of this committee have fallen short in any degree of the high expectations which we all entertain respecting them. I am not vain enough to presume that I can add any important detail to the mass of information which was presented by the illustrious chairman of that committee in his opening address, or that I can add any light to the very illuminating speech of the gentleman from Connecticut, or strengthen by so much as a hair the iron logic of the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

But, Mr. Chairman, as I have listened day after day to the speeches that have been made upon this question, as I have reflected more deeply and analyzed more closely the arguments that have gone to the forming of the conclusions which my own mind has reached, I find that my support of this measure is based fundamentally not alone upon the reasons that have been emphasized in this discussion, but on some reasons that have been but barely touched upon and upon some others that have as yet received no mention at all. It is because of this that I venture to ask the attention of the House to some brief observations which I hope may be deemed worthy of consideration.

In order that the main point which I wish to bring before the House may be clear when it is reached, let me submit a few preliminary remarks.

I agree at once with those who base their support of this bill upon the proposition that no American industry will be injured by its passage. It is a fundamental economic law that when a given market is to be supplied with a given article that portion of the supply of the article which is the dearest will govern the price of the whole. It is in obedience to this law that the price of sugar in the United States is fixed not by the million tons that are produced in Hawaii, Porto Rico, and the United States proper, or by the 1,200,000 tons that come from Cuba and pay 80 per cent of the Dingley rates, but by the 600,000 tons which are imported from the world at large and pay 100 per cent of the Dingley duty. It follows, therefore, that no supply to the markets of the United States at any cost or at any duty however low from the Philippines can affect the price of sugar in the United States until both Cuban and foriegn importations cease.

To put it another way, the domestic production and the Philippine importations combined must first be sufficient to supply our entire demand before the price can be affected by either Philippine or domestic production.

Up to this time the increase in consumption in this country has grown faster than the increase in domestic production, and there is no reason to hope that this condition will be changed at any very early date in the future. It follows, therefore, that Philippine importation must increase to at least 1,800,000 tons annually before any effect will be felt in the price. The Philippines produced last year 110,000 tons. The consumption of the islands themselves calls for about 80,000 tons, leaving 30,000 tons for export. Until this 30,000 tons become 1,800,000 tons the American producer need have no fear. How long is that going to be? It has taken Cuba fifty years to increase her production 200 per cent. It has taken Louisiana twenty-five years to increase her production 300 per cent. How long will it take the Philippines to increase their production 6,000 per cent? Can anybody believe that this increase will be so rapid as to overtake the marvelous growth in the demand which in twenty years has doubled the amount of sugar necessary to supply the markets of the United States?

It is a matter of record that whenever in the past the output of Philippine plantations has exceeded 200,000 tons of sugar part of the cane crop has rotted in the field for lack of labor to harvest it, and that, too, at a time when the laws laid no restriction upon the importation of Chinese.

Where can we expect to find the labor that would be required to take care of a crop of 2,000,000 tons? Experts tell us that the machinery alone required to handle 2,000,000 tons of sugar annually would cost $110,000,000, not taking into account the cost of acquiring and clearing the land and the working capital necessary to carry on the business, which would be at least $25,000,000 more. Where is that enormous capital to come from; and when it has been found, how long will it take to install the plants and bring the plantations into cultivation? The opponents of this bill would have us believe that if it becomes a law some magician's wand will wave over the Philippine Islands, calling into being thousands of workmen, transforming in a night the tropical jungle into mellow plantation ground, and erecting enormous mills crowded with expensive machinery, "while you wait." And surely nothing less than such an enchantment could bring about the conditions which they predict.

I do not question for a moment the sincerity of the gentlemen who oppose this bill, and I honor the fidelity to the supposed interests of their constituents which prompts this opposition. I can not but wonder, however, at the peculiar construction of a mind which apparently fails to recognize the fatal flaw in the reasoning by which they seek to justify their position.

The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. YOUNG], for example, agrees with the chairman of the committee that in point of intellectual development and in labor effectiveness the Filipinos are but boys 12 years of age; and yet he would have us believe that these feeble and ineffectual boys could drive the American sugar grower out of his own market. The other gentleman from Michigan [Mr. LOUD] painted a pitiful—and as true as pitiful, alas—picture of the poverty of the Philippine planter, and told us of the usurious interest—from 36 to 100 per cent—he was obliged to pay for the capital to work his plantation, and then he asks us to believe that this same impoverished and debt-ridden planter could multiply his business a thousandfold in a few short years. The gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] declared with great vehemence that if this bill were passed the sugar trust and not the Filipino producer would reap the profit, and he insists that this same Filipino producer, in a spirit of altruism, I presume, would at once go to work with energy miraculously multiplied to pile up a product in the profit of which he could have no share. And the distinguished gentleman from Colorado, in a speech whose rhetoric and eloquence we all admired, declared in a single sentence, the two statements being separated by only a comma, that the passage of this bill would do the Filipino no good and yet would stimulate the production of sugar in the Philippines to such an extent as to utterly ruin the American industry. Must it not be conceded, I ask with all respect, that a position is utterly untenable which can only be sustained through such palpable contradictions? No, Mr. Chairman, knowing, as I do, the prostrate condition of the sugar industry at this moment in the Philippines, knowing the difficulty and expense involved in subduing the tropical jungle, and knowing the utter impossibility of multiplying with great rapidity either the supply or the efficiency of Philippine labor, I am not disturbed by the charge that the passage of this bill will bring disaster to any American industry.

Neither am I disturbed, Mr. Chairman, by the declaration, brought as a reproach on this side of the Chamber and claimed as a merit on the other side, that this is a Democratic measure. To my way of thinking, it is not a tariff measure at all—I mean in the old controversial free trade and protection sense. It is a revenue measure. We have inaugurated a tremendously expensive system of government in the Philippine Islands. I do not know of any other country where the annual budget is equal to the entire volume of money in circulation. I do not mean to charge that we have spent, or are spending, any money there for which we have not had a full equivalent. On the contrary, I believe that the finances of the islands under American administration have been managed with almost absolute probity. I do believe, however, that we have gone too fast. We have done things in five years which the leisurely oriental would have felt himself hurried to be asked to do in twenty-five. We have tried to "hustle the East," and it has cost money. In the present impoverished condition of the islands it would be a hardship, nay, an impossibility, to collect from the Filipinos themselves the money required. It would be a bad precedent, to say the least, to appropriate an amount sufficient to make up the deficit directly from our own Treasury. There is precedent, however, for returning to the island treasury the sums collected in our custom-houses as tariff upon Philippine products coming into our ports, and it is that precedent which this bill follows. If the Philippine treasury did not need this relief the measure before us, we are assured by the chairman of the Ways and Means Committee, would provide for absolute free trade. It is a revenue measure, therefore, pure and simple, and I do not consider that I am abating one jot or tittle in my loyalty to the doctrine of protection in supporting it. I do not know of a declaration in any Republican platform calling upon me to vote for a tariff upon products passing from one port in the United States to another.

I favor this bill, therefore, because I believe its passage will not harm or menace any American industry, because I believe it will, in some degree at least, improve the very distressing economic conditions now existing in the Philippines, and because it will contribute a substantal sum to a depleted treasury.

But fundamentally—and I come now to the point which I regard as the most vitally important involved in this whole controversy—fundamentally I am for this bill, because the Philippine Islands are ours, they always should be ours, and they always will be ours.

They are ours now. Nobody denies that. By the triple right of conquest, purchase, and treaty stipulation the United States is sovereign in the Philippine Islands, and nobody any longer questions either our moral or our legal right to be there.

They always should be ours. I do not expect that sentiment to be applauded in this House. We are striking out upon a new road. For the first time in our history we are attempting to govern a foreign colony. For the first time in all history we are undertaking to govern an alien people primarily for their own benefit and not for our profit. It is a new and hard task, and the burden of it lies heavy on us. As a matter merely of our own ease and comfort we would fain be free of it. But I can not help believing that it is a short-range view which inspires that feeling. If I thought this great Republic were to endure but another generation, or maybe two, I also should take that view. But I believe with all my heart, and I try to remember always, that this nation is but in its infancy. The Republic of Rome, inchoate, unorganized, corrupt as it was, lasted five hundred years. Why should not this magnificent political organism, the United States of America, resting upon the free will of the most homogeneous, the best organized, the most intelligent people ever before assembled under one flag in all the tide of times, endure for five thousand years? And why should not those whose high privilege it is to legislate for such a country remember, in shaping that legislation, that others are to come after them, and that their duty is not to finish the structure, but to see to it that the one block which they lay in the mighty wall which is to support the labor of future generations is laid solid and true?

And looking at the question from that point of view, why should we not keep the Philippines? That they are remote from our shores is true. That they are unproductive now I admit. That for many years to come—possibly as long as any of us shall live—they will cost us more than we will get out of them, I am willing to concede. That their present population is made up largely of an alien race I can not deny. But I remember that every one of these objections, and many more besides, were urged against every addition to our territory that has yet been made. I remember that the purchase of Louisiana was bitterly antagonized, particularly by the statesmen of New England—who could see as far into the future, perhaps, as those of a later generation—on the ground that 3 cents an acre was a monstrous price to pay for an empty and unproductive wilderness. I remember that the annexation of Texas was derided as an act of stupendous folly. I remember that when the treaty with Mexico, which brought to us the vast domain which stretches from the Rio Grande to the Pacific, was under consideration, Daniel Webster—"the godlike Daniel"—speaking from his place in the Senate, said:

> There are some things one can argue against with temper, and submit to, if overruled, without mortification. There are other things that seem to affect one's consciousness of being a sensible man, and to imply a disposition to impose upon his common sense. And of this class of topics, or pretensions, I have never heard of anything more ridiculous in itself, more absurd, and more affrontive to all sober judgment than the cry that we are getting indemnity by the acquisition of New Mexico and California. I hold they are not worth a dollar, and we pay for them vast sums of money!

I remember that when the nation's claims to the Oregon country were under consideration a distinguished United States Senator [Mr. McDuffie] said:

> What is the nature of the country? Why, as I understand it, 700 miles this side of the Rocky Mountains is uninhabitable; a region where rain seldom falls; a barren, sandy soil; mountainous, totally impassable. Well, now, what are we going to do in this case? How are you going to employ steam? Have you made anything like an estimate of the cost of a railroad from here to the Columbia? Why, the wealth of the Indies would be insufficient. Of what use will this be for agricultural purposes? Why, I would not for that purpose give a pinch of snuff for the whole territory. I thank God for His mercy in placing the Rocky Mountains there.

I remember that when the purchase of Alaska was contemplated Benjamin F. Butler, a Representative from Massachusetts, declared:

If we are to pay for Russia's friendship this amount I desire to give her the $7,200,000 and let her keep Alaska. * * * I have no doubt that any time within the last twenty years we could have had Alaska for the asking. I have heard it was so stated in the Cabinets of two Presidents, provided we would have taken it as a gift. But no man, except one insane enough to buy the earthquakes in St. Thomas and the ice fields in Greenland, could be found to agree to any other terms for its acquisition to the country.

I remember—and I am speaking now of my personal and not of my historical recollection—when a President of the United States rejected the petition of the people of the Hawaiian Islands for annexation to the American Union.

The men who opposed these mighty movements of national expansion were among those who were accounted wise in their day, as wise possibly as are the statesmen of this day who exhaust the vocabulary of protest and pessimism in their denunciation of the tendency of their countrymen to go "a world powering." The policy of "world powering" did not begin, Mr. Chairman, with the acquisition of the Philippines. It began when Monroe and Livingston—not Jefferson; he was scared to death when he learned that instead of buying New Orleans and West Florida, as he had instructed them to do, his commissioners had made a contract for the whole of Louisiana—the policy of world powering, I say, began when Monroe and Livingston determined that their country should not be bounded on the west henceforth and forever by the Mississippi River. From the day when it became certain that the United States of America was to be a continental Republic, from that day the policy of world powering began; and it will not end until energy and enterprise and ambition have ceased to be the dominating characteristics of American citizenship. [Applause.] I do not pretend to be wiser than my compeers, or to be able to see farther into the future than they, but I know that history has a way of repeating itself. I know that the timorous and fearful statesmen who predicted disaster at every one of the successive accessions of territory which carried our flag from the Alleghenies to the western sea were mistaken, and it is not hard for me to conceive that the statesmen of our day who invoke the same arguments to support their protest against our permanent retention of the Philippines may be equally mistaken. When I remember that there are 50,000,000 acres of magnificent hard-wood forests in these islands that have not heard the sound of ax or saw, when I remember that there are vast deposits of coal and iron and other minerals as yet untouched, when I remember that only 3 per cent of the available agricultural land of the archipelago is now occupied, and when I remember that the great harbor of Manila lies but a two days' voyage from the coast of Asia, it is not hard for me to see a day in the future when the population of the Philippines will be quadrupled, when their products will be multiplied in value a thousandfold, when Manila will be the distributing point for a commerce rivaling that which now makes Hongkong the busiest port in the Orient. All this is but a dream, you say. What would the pessimists, nay, what would the optimists of 1803 have said if some one had told them even a thousandth part of the truth about the Louisiana of 1903?

But even if I were less sure than I am that the Philippines should be ours, there is one thing concerning which I have no shadow of doubt, and that is that they always will be ours. [Applause.] Do you want to know why? Read the record of the Anglo-Saxon race. In all its history has it ever failed to take any acre of land it could get, and has it ever let go of any foot of land upon which it had once laid its hand? What has been the record of the race on this continent? Let Louisiana and Florida and New Mexico and California and Oregon and Alaska answer. I have already called your attention to the protests that rose in angry chorus against each and every one of these additions to our national domain, and if I cared to take your time I could fill a hundred pages of the RECORD with them.

But you all know the history. There has not been an argument used against the acquisition of the Philippines that was not hurled against the Louisiana purchase and each and every subsequent addition to our territory. It is old, old straw that we have been thrashing over these past eight years. And there has not been a prediction of dire disaster to come from that acquisition that can not find a parallel in the prophecies of a hundred years ago. We read those prophecies now and smile at the short vision of the men who were accounted wise in their day, even as our children's children will smile at the blindness of those in our day who can not see beyond the horizon of their own short hour.

We will keep the Philippines, not only under the compulsion of our race instinct for the possession of land, but also because of the compulsion of our race sense of duty. [Applause.] I can not agree with the distinguished gentleman from Mississippi that we might have left the islands when Dewey fired his last gun and violated no obligation. We had destroyed the only power capable of maintaining order in the archipelago. To have done this and then sailed away, leaving anarchy and chaos, rapine, plunder, and murder behind us, would have been an act of heartlessness and pusillanimity that would have called down upon us, and justly so, the execration of the civilized world.

From that day to this, in my deliberate judgment, there has never been an hour when we could have abandoned the Philippines without dishonor. And that hour will not come in the lifetime of any man now living. Even those who insist most strongly that we must some time leave the islands admit that we can not do it until we have established a stable government to leave behind us. How long will that be, Mr. Chairman? Remember that there is no such thing as a Filipino people, with a common language, common interests, common aspirations and ambitions. Remember that even such as they are they are Malays, a race which never in all history has developed a self-governing community. Remember that for three hundred years they have had before them only the bad example of Spanish despotism, misrule, and corruption. Is it reasonable to believe that such a people, thus descended and thus environed, should develop overnight the delicate and difficult art of self-government? Why, Mr. Chairman, our own race, with an executive and organizing faculty unequaled by any race in history, was a thousand years learning to govern itself. Is it conceivable that these Malays should accomplish in a single generation that which it has taken our own race twenty generations to achieve? They must be taught honesty; they must be taught justice; they must be taught truth telling; they must be taught industry; they must be taught that labor is honorable and not degrading. Above all, they must be taught what their own rights are under the law, and they must be taught the courage to demand those rights. All these things, which are the Anglo-Saxon birthright, these Malays must be taught. If they learn them in three generations they will have surpassed any other race in history.

But during these three generations what will be happening in the Philippine Islands? Why, American citizens will be going there, opening plantations, establishing commercial and manufacturing industries, building railroads, investing their capital in a thousand ways, binding the islands to the mainland by a thousand different ties. What will that mean? It will mean that by the time the Filipinos are capable of maintaining that "stable government" which we are pledged to give them before we leave, the Philippine Islands will be American territory in just as real and true a sense as Alaska or California are American territory, and the proposition to sever the ties that bind them to us would receive as little consideration as would the proposition to recede to Mexico to-day the territory which came to us through the treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo. And it will mean another thing, Mr. Chairman. It will mean that when the time has come, whether it be in one generation or in three or in ten generations, when the Filipino people are capable of maintaining a government which shall be in fact a government of the people, for the people, and by the people they will have seen so clearly the advantage of American sovereignty, they will have developed so true a love for the great and generous nation which took them by the hand in the hour of their greatest need and led them out of the mire of ignorance, oppression, and poverty up onto the solid ground of education, freedom, and prosperity that they will no more wish to separate themselves from the home land than Kansas wishes to-day to secede from the Union. [Applause.]

I shall vote for this bill, Mr. Chairman, because it will harm no American industry, because it will hasten the return of prosperity in the Philippines, because it will raise much-needed revenue, but most of all because it assures to the people of the Philippine Islands that measure of justice which should be accorded to a people who are under the flag of this great Republic, who will always remain under it, and who will find beneath its starry folds, even as we have found there, freedom and justice, prosperity and peace. [Loud applause.]

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. OLMSTED, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had further considered House bill No. 3—the Philippine tariff bill—and had come to no resolution thereon.

BRIDGE ACROSS THE COLUMBIA RIVER, WASHINGTON.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 2558) authorizing the Washington Bridge Company to construct a bridge across the Columbia River near the city of Wenatchee, Wash.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Washington asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill S. 2558, of which the Clerk will read the title.

The Clerk read as follows:

Authorizing the Washington Bridge Company to construct a bridge across the Columbia River near the city of Wenatchee, Wash.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the gentleman if a similar bill has been reported by the House committee?

Mr. JONES of Washington. The House committee has reported a bill, and this is the bill.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Was it the unanimous report of the committee?

Mr. JONES of Washington. It was the unanimous report.

The Clerk read the bill and amendment at length.

The committee amendment was considered, and agreed to.

The bill was read a third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. JONES of Washington, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

And then, on motion of Mr. PAYNE (at 5 o'clock and 20 minutes p. m.), the House adjourned until Monday, January 15, at 11 o'clock a. m.

SETTLERS ON UINTA INDIAN RESERVATION LANDS.

Mr. SMOOT. I am directed by the Committee on Public Lands to report back favorably with an amendment the bill (S. 321) to provide for the extension of time within which homestead settlers may establish their residence upon certain lands which were heretofore a part of the Uinta Indian Reservation, within the counties of Uinta and Wasatch, in the State of Utah, and I ask for its present consideration.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will be read for the information of the Senate.

The Secretary read the bill; and by unanimous consent the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration.

The amendment of the committee was, in line 12, page 1, to strike out the word "matter" and insert the word "manner;" so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the homestead settlers on lands which were heretofore a part of the Uinta Indian Reservation, within the counties of Uinta and Wasatch, in the State of Utah, opened under the acts of May 27, 1902, and March 3, 1903, and March 3, 1905, be, and they are hereby, granted an extension of time in which to establish their residence upon the lands so opened and filed upon until the 15th day of May, A. D. 1906: Provided, however, That this act shall in no manner affect the regularity or validity of such filings, or any of them, so made by the said settlers on the lands aforesaid; and it is only intended hereby to extend the time for the establishment of such residence as herein provided, and the provisions of said acts are in no other manner to be affected or modified.

Mr. ALLISON. I ask the Senator from Utah to make a brief statement of the bill.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, the object in asking the extension of time for the settlers to establish their residence within the Uinta Reservation is owing to the fact that it is impossible for people to go there in February and March.

Last July the President issued his proclamation opening the reservation, and in August the drawing took place, proceeding from the 1st to the 12th of August last year. August 28 was the day set for the first filings on those lands and they were to extend for sixty days from that time, so many filings each day; and that would throw the time of settlement into the dead of winter, as the law requires it must be done within six months.

It is absolutely impossible for people to get in there in the months of January, February, or March. The bill proposes that the time shall be extended until May 15 of the present year for the homesteaders to establish their residence on the land filed on. The people had no chance to say when they could file upon the land, for that was done by the regulation of the General Land Office, and it was at a time when, as I said, it was absolutely impossible to establish their residence within six months on the lands filed on.

Therefore I ask that the bill be passed now, because February 28 is in the dead of winter, and if the time is not extended the settlers will have to go there and attempt to make their homes at that time, which would be impossible. The bill proposes to extend the time until May 15.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment reported by the committee.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. LONG introduced a bill (S. 3241) to reimburse Ulysses G. Winn for money erroneously paid into the Treasury of the United States; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

He also introduced a bill (S. 3242) granting an increase of pension to Daniel Woolley; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying paper, referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. NELSON introduced a bill (S. 3243) granting an increase of pension to Akey C. Johnson; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. NIXON introduced a bill (S. 3244) granting an increase of pension to Anna F. Keith; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. PATTERSON introduced the following bills; which were severally read twice by their titles, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands:
A bill (S. 3245) creating the Mesa Verde National Park;
A bill (S. 3246) ceding to the city of Canyon City, Colo., certain lands for park purposes;
A bill (S. 3247) creating the Royal Gorge National Park;
A bill (S. 3248) to set aside portions of the public domain for experiment in rubber culture; and
A bill (S. 3249) for the relief of Leann S. King, assign of Thomas Leitensdorfer.

Mr. PATTERSON introduced the following bills; which were severally read twice by their titles, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary:
A bill (S. 3250) to establish a laboratory for the study of the criminal, pauper, and defective classes; and
A bill (S. 3251) providing that all contributions hereafter made to political committees engaged in promoting the election of Representatives or Delegates to the Congress of the United States or of Presidential electors at any election at which such Representatives or Delegates shall be voted for shall be reported by such committees to the Clerk of the House of Representatives of the Congress of the United States, and for other purposes.

Mr. PATTERSON introduced a bill (S. 3252) granting an increase of pension to David F. Crampton; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also introduced a bill (S. 3253) to apply a portion of the proceeds of the sales of public lands to the endowment of schools or departments of mines and mining in connection with the colleges established in the several States under the provisions of an act approved July 2, 1862, entitled "An act donating public lands to the several States and Territories which may provide colleges for the benefit of agriculture and the mechanic arts," and for similar purposes, being a further supplement to said act; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Mines and Mining.

Mr. ALDRICH introduced the following bills; which were severally read twice by their titles, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Pensions:

A bill (S. 3254) granting an increase of pension to Anna Frances Hall; and

A bill (S. 3255) granting an increase of pension to Joseph Cook.

Mr. SPOONER introduced a bill (S. 3256) for the relief of William Persons; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

He also introduced a bill (S. 3257) granting an increase of pension to Walter Green; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying paper, referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. SCOTT introduced a bill (S. 3258) to extend School street to Columbia road and connecting School street thus extended with Fourteenth street, and to establish a park at Fourteenth street and Columbia road; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

AMENDMENT TO DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. PENROSE submitted an amendment proposing to appropriate $435 to pay the widow of Fergus G. Malone, late inspector of customs, for expense incurred in preserving and transporting his remains from Seattle, Wash., to Philadelphia, Pa., intended to be proposed by him to the general deficiency appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

TRADE IN AMERICAN COTTON GOODS.

Mr. CLAY. I submit an amendment proposing to appropriate $250,000, and providing for the appointment of a commission for the purpose of studying the conditions of the markets of the Far East and Central and South America with a view to opening new avenues to the trade in American cotton goods, which I intend to propose to the agricultural appropriation bill. I move that it be printed and referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. CLAY. In connection with the amendment which I have just offered, I present a joint resolution of the general assembly of the State of Georgia, which I ask to have read and referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

There being no objection, the joint resolution was read, and referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, as follows:

A joint resolution.

Whereas it is of the highest importance that new and wider markets should be found for American cotton goods; and

Whereas, while authentic reports show an encouraging increase in the volume of trade in American cotton goods in north China and in the Orient generally, there is an immense territory, both in the Far East and in Central and South America, whose people know practically nothing of cotton goods of American or other manufacture; and

Whereas the New Orleans convention of January, 1905, composed of cotton producers, southern cotton manufacturers, bankers, et al., suggested the creation of a national commission to inquire into and report in detail on the subject of additional markets for American cotton goods; and

Whereas the general assembly of Georgia is in hearty sympathy with the Southern Cotton Association in its great work: Therefore, be it

Resolved by the house of representatives (the senate concurring), That our Senators in Congress be instructed, and our Representatives in Congress be requested, to use their best and most persistent efforts to have Congress authorize His Excellency the President, without unnecessary delay, to appoint a commission of capable gentlemen, representatives not only of the South, but of the entire country, charged with the duty of visiting the territory referred to and studying its people and their condition with a view to opening up new avenues to the trade in American cotton goods.

Resolved further, That such commission should not only be composed of men qualified for the duties assigned them, but should be liberally provided for by the General Government, to the end that they may devote themselves enthusiastically to the important work and mission committed to their hands.

Resolved further, That a certified copy of the foregoing preamble and resolution, duly attested, as soon as approved by his excellency the governor, be transmitted by the secretary of the senate and the clerk of the house of representatives to each of our Senators and Representatives in Congress.

Resolved further, That as soon as the foregoing preamble and resolution have been approved by his excellency the governor it shall be the duty of the secretary of state to prepare a certified copy and transmit the same, under the great seal of the State, to His Excellency the President of the United States.

JOHN M. SLATON, Speaker of House.
JOHN T. BOIFEUILLET, Clerk of House.
C. S. NORTHEN, Secretary of Senate.

ACTS AND TREATIES RELATIVE TO ALASKA.

Mr. NELSON. I present a compilation of the acts and treaties relating to the district of Alaska, which has been prepared by the Bureau of Insular Affairs, War Department, together with indexes and references to decisions of the Supreme Court and the opinions of the Attorney-General, which I ask to have printed as a Senate document. In connection therewith I have a short letter from the Secretary of War, calling my attention to this matter, which is as follows:

WAR DEPARTMENT,
Washington, January 11, 1906.

MY DEAR SENATOR NELSON: I have written Senator BEVERIDGE, as chairman of the Committee on Territories, inviting his attention to the fact that some time ago I directed the law adviser of the Insular Bureau to have prepared a compilation of the statutes affecting Alaska. A very competent law clerk named Barker has made the compilation, and has introduced references to Supreme Court and other decisions affecting the Territory, and has made a very complete index. It is ready now for publication. I doubt my authority as Secretary of War to order its publication out of the War Department appropriation, and I write to see whether you could not possibly obtain its publication as a Congressional or Senate or House document. Will you kindly confer with Senator BEVERIDGE in regard to the matter, and also, if possible, with Mr. HAMILTON, of the House committee.

Very sincerely, yours, WM. H. TAFT.

Hon. KNUTE NELSON,
United States Senate.

I will say further, Mr. President, that I have made a brief examination of the compilation. I think it is a very good piece of work, which has cost the Government nothing, and, therefore, I ask that it may be printed as a Senate document.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Minnesota asks that the compilation referred to by him may be printed as a Senate document. Is there objection to the request?

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. President, I should like to inquire of the Senator from Minnesota what sized volume that would make, and what would be the cost of it?

Mr. NELSON. I do not think it will be a very large volume. Part of it is in manuscript. I am not able to say just how large a volume it will make, but I have looked it through. Including the index, it would not be a very large volume—not over 200 or 300 pages, I think.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Minnesota? The Chair hears none, and the order to print is made.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS—JOHN W. DAMPMAN.

On motion of Mr. PENROSE, it was Ordered, That leave be granted to withdraw from the files of the Senate the papers in the case of John W. Dampman, accompanying Senate bill 2571, Fifty-seventh Congress, first session, copies of the same to be left in the files, as provided by clause 2 of Rule XXX.

REORGANIZATION OF CONSULAR SERVICE.

Mr. LODGE. Copies of the bill (S. 1345) to provide for the reorganization of the consular service of the United States are entirely exhausted. I ask for a reprint of the bill, and that 1,000 additional copies be printed for the use of the State Department.

There being no objection, the order was agreed to, as follows:

Ordered, That Senate bill (S. 1345) to provide for the reorganization of the consular service of the United States be reprinted, and that 1,000 additional copies be printed for the use of the State Department.

NATIONAL BOARD OF CORPORATIONS.

Mr. HEYBURN. I am advised at the document room that the number of copies of the bill (S. 2398) to create the National Board of Corporations and to provide for the regulation thereby of corporations engaged in interstate, Territorial, district, or insular-possession business is reduced down to about thirty. There is call for the bill, and I ask that 500 additional copies be printed.

There being no objection, the order was agreed to, as follows:

Ordered, That 500 additional copies of Senate bill (S. 2398) to create the National Board of Corporations and to provide for the regulation thereby of corporations engaged in interstate, Territorial, district, or insular-possession business be printed for the use of the Senate document room.

AMENDMENT TO RULES.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I offer a proposed amendment to the rules, which I ask to have read, printed, and referred to the Committee on Rules.

The proposed amendment was read, ordered to be printed, and referred to the Committee on Rules, as follows:

Amend paragraph 5 of Rule XIV by substituting for said paragraph the following:

"All resolutions shall lie over one day for consideration unless by unanimous consent the Senate shall otherwise direct. After a resolution has had consideration on one day it shall go to the Calendar unless otherwise ordered, and while it remains on the Calendar no other resolution covering the same subject-matter shall be received except by unanimous consent."

HEARINGS BEFORE COMMITTEE ON MILITARY AFFAIRS.

Mr. PETTUS submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate:

Resolved, That the Committee on Military Affairs is authorized to employ a stenographer, when necessary, for hearings before said committee, to be paid out of the contingent fund of the Senate.

HEARINGS BEFORE COMMITTEE ON POST-OFFICES AND POST-ROADS.

Mr PENROSE submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate:

Resolved, That the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads be, and the same is hereby, authorized to employ a stenographer from time to time, as may be necessary, to report such hearings as may be had on bills or other matters pending before said committee, and to have the same printed for the use of the committee, and that such stenographer be paid out of the contingent fund of the Senate.

GEORGE A. RAHN.

Mr. HEYBURN submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Senate be, and he hereby is, authorized and directed to pay from the "miscellaneous items" of the contingent fund of the Senate the funeral expenses and physician's bill of George A. Rahn, late a policeman of the Senate, not to exceed $200, in full of all other allowances.

POTOMAC RIVER MEMORIAL BRIDGE.

Mr. DANIEL. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that Order of Business No. 10, being the bill (S. 1373) to provide for the construction of a memorial bridge across the Potomac River from Washington to the Arlington estate property, be now considered.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. If the Senator will withhold his motion until after the morning business has been closed, the Chair will then recognize him.

Mr. DANIEL. I beg pardon; I thought the morning business had been concluded.

THE PANAMA CANAL.

Mr. KITTREDGE submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That there be printed 1,500 copies of Senate Document No. 127, Fifty-ninth Congress, parts 1 and 2, in one volume, with paper cover, of which 1,000 shall be for the use of the Senate and 500 for the use of the Isthmian Canal Commission.

THE MERCHANT MARINE.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I have some valuable memoranda in reference to the shipping question, which were very carefully compiled for the late Merchant Marine Commission; which I ask to have printed as a Senate document.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from New Hampshire asks that the matter referred to by him may be printed as a Senate document. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and that order is made.

EXISTING STATUS IN SANTO DOMINGO.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President, I desire to give notice that on Wednesday next, immediately after the conclusion of the morning business, I shall ask the Senate to consider Senate resolution No. 39, in order that I may submit what few ideas I have got on the Santo Domingo status, which is the subject of the resolution. Since I submitted the resolution we have found out where Morales is, but I want to submit some remarks on the subject-matter.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The notice given by the Senator will be entered.

PARTICIPATION IN EUROPEAN INTERNATIONAL QUESTIONS.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, I offer the resolution which I send to the desk, which I shall move to have referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations. Before that order is taken, however, I desire to submit some remarks on the matter of reference.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The resolution submitted by the Senator from Georgia will be read.

The Secretary read the resolution, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate, That interference with or participation in any controversy between European governments relating to European international questions is a violation of the well-settled, well-defined policy of this Government, which has been recognized and observed for more than a century past.

Mr. BACON addressed the Senate. After having spoken one hour—

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. A bill (S. 529) to promote the national defense, to create a force of naval volunteers, to establish American ocean mail lines to foreign markets, to promote commerce, and to provide revenue from tonnage.

Mr. GALLINGER. I will ask the Senator from Georgia if he desires to continue?

Mr. BACON. If the Senator will kindly indulge me, I promise to be very short.

Mr. GALLINGER. I will state to the Senate that I have some amendments which I desire to offer to this bill, after which, if they are adopted, as I presume they will be, I shall ask that a reprint of the bill be ordered.

The Senator from Florida [Mr. MALLORY] gave notice that he would speak to-day, but he has not been in the Chamber, so I presume he will not occupy any time. The Senator from West Virginia [Mr. SCOTT] desires to speak very briefly, but there will be opportunity for that after the Senator from Georgia concludes. I ask unanimous consent that the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside until the matter now under discussion shall be disposed of.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from New Hampshire asks unanimous consent that the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside. Without objection, it is so ordered. The Senator from Georgia will proceed.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, on last Monday I introduced a resolution requesting of the President of the United States, if not incompatible with the public interest, that certain information be given to the Senate relative to the appointment of, or the alleged appointment of, delegates to a European conference in reference to the Moroccan matter. The question of the consideration of that resolution in public was by order of the Senate considered in secret session. What I shall have to say to-day will not in any manner contravene the order of the Senate in that regard. The particular scope of the resolution was one calling upon the Senate to ask certain information from the President. I shall not discuss the question of asking information from the President, nor shall I discuss any information received from the President, because it so happens that we have not received from the President any information with reference to the Moroccan matter. What I shall have to say will relate exclusively to a great public question of vital importance and with reference to the information we have upon that subject from the press of this country and of the world, which has not been communicated to us in confidence, which is not enjoyed by us alone, but which we have learned in this public manner and which is known to all the world.

I presume, Mr. President, whatever may be true in the future, at present, at least, the right to publicly discuss such matters upon information thus obtained in public, still remains to the American Senate.

Before discussing directly the question involved in the resolution, I desire to read to the Senate part of a news article which appeared on yesterday in the Washington Post under the head, "Data on Morocco." That article, in part, is as follows:

Secretary Root yesterday permitted without hesitation a representative of the Post to see all the papers bearing on the Moroccan question. This is the subject that excited so much interest in the Senate last week by reason of the introduction of a resolution by Mr. BACON calling upon the President to send to the Senate a copy of the instructions he has given to the two delegates he appointed to represent the United States at the international conference at Algeciras, Spain, beginning January 17.

As previously announced by the Post, any member of the Senate is at liberty to call at the State Department and examine the documents in the case and study minutely every phase of the issues involved as revealed by the correspondence which resulted in President Roosevelt appointing the delegates and the instructions sent to them. The instructions were conceived and written by Elihu Root. Those who know John Hay's successor at the head of the Department of State will understand from this that the instructions do not contain anything that savors of impingement by the Executive upon the legislative functions or that in any way is calculated to commit this Government to a policy that will embroil the United States in the politics of Europe.

Both President Roosevelt and Secretary Root are known to regret the fuss and fume created in the Senate last week by the Bacon resolution. It is also known that neither of them requested Senator LODGE or anybody else to oppose the adoption of the Bacon resolution, though they heartily approved the action of Messrs. LODGE, SPOONER, and other Senators, who in the secret sessions contested the position of Mr. BACON.

PUBLICITY MIGHT INTERFERE.

It is asserted by the President and Mr. Root that the only objection to a copy of the instructions being sent to the Senate as requested by Mr. BACON is based upon the fear that some of the correspondence of the State Department with its confidential agents in Morocco and in Europe touching upon the issues involved might gain publicity and thereby cause embarrassment to two or three European nations that will participate in the Algeciras conference.

All of this correspondence is included in the pamphlet containing the instructions to the United States delegates.

Mr. President, I think I may safely assume that that publication is by authority of the State Department—at least I think I may safely assume that every allegation in it is in consequence of a communication which this newspaper reporter has had with the Secretary of State and that the allegations are in accordance with those statements thus made to him.

Mr. LODGE. Why does the Senator think he has the right to make that assumption?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. PERKINS in the chair). Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. BACON. I have yielded, Mr. President.

I make the statement because all of the allegations in this article are of a nature which import that they could not possibly have been learned except through the Secretary of State, and the article contains the indicia of authenticity, unless we are prepared to believe that so reputable a newspaper as the Washington Post, with its well-known writers of high character, integrity, and credibility, has deliberately falsified when it represents that this information has been received by it from the executive department. That is the ground upon which I base the statement that I think we may safely assume that this statement is issued by the authority and upon the representations of the Department of State.

Mr. LODGE. Is it stated there that the information was received directly from the Secretary of State?

Mr. BACON. I would call attention to several things; but the article begins by stating:

Secretary Root—

Calling him by name—

Secretary Root yesterday permitted without hesitation a representative of the Post to see all the papers bearing on the Moroccan question.

That is the way the narration begins.

Mr. LODGE. Does the Senator think that that makes the State Department responsible for that article?

Mr. BACON. I am going on to tell the Senate why I think the State Department is responsible. I do not have any pleasure in bringing this matter to the attention of the Senate, and I shall be more than delighted if the Senator, with his close relations to the State Department, can at any time be able to rise in his seat and say that that is not the correct representation of the information imparted by the Secretary of State to this newspaper writer. I will feel a personal obligation to the Senator if he can give that assurance, and this Senate—if I may be permitted to presume so far as to speak for it—will be under obligations to the Senator if he can secure from the Secretary of State a disavowal of the things which are stated in this article.

Mr. ALDRICH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Rhode Island?

Mr. BACON. With great pleasure.

Mr. ALDRICH. From my knowledge of the personal characteristics of the Secretary of State, I should think it very unlikely, if he decided to communicate to the Senate or to Senators in reference to a matter of this kind, that he should do so through a newspaper correspondent.

Mr. BACON. Very well. I shall also be under equal obligations to the Senator from Rhode Island if he can bring to this Senate that assurance. But, Mr. President——

Mr. LODGE. The Senator misunderstood my question. I do not care to discuss the statements contained in that article or any other article, for I think that would be contravening the decision of the Senate. I merely wish to find out whether the Senator is prepared to state that that article was inspired or authorized by the Secretary of State.

Mr. BACON. Does the Senator mean that I can state it as a fact?

Mr. LODGE. I should like to have it stated as a fact.

Mr. BACON. The Senator very well knows that I have no opportunity to know that as a fact. I am judging simply by surface indications—by that which appears on the paper itself—not even by any information which I have received from the newspaper reporter or the slightest communication which I have had with him on the subject, but I judge of it just as a court would judge when a paper is presented as to the authenticity of it or as to the relation which it may bear to the question.

Mr. LODGE. The Senator said we were to assume it.

Mr. BACON. I said I think it is fair to assume it, and I still think so.

Mr. LODGE. The Senator has a right to assume anything he pleases, but I think he can hardly commit the entire Senate to that assumption.

Mr. BACON. Very well. I will say for myself, as I did say for myself, I can fairly assume it. I did not presume in that to speak for the Senate; but I do presume to speak for the Senate when I say that is not respectful to the Senate, and that if the Senator can secure the disavowal of the Secretary of State he will confer not only an obligation upon the Secretary of State, but also upon the Senate.

Mr. LODGE. It seems to me that is the very best reason for assuming that the Secretary of State is not responsible for it if it is disrespectful to the Senate.

Mr. BACON. That may be true; that is one argument. But if there are other evidences which bear out in a still greater degree the fact that it is not, we must strike the balance.

Mr. LODGE. The Senator has no right to charge disrespect or any intention or desire of being disrespectful to the Senate on the faith of a newspaper article of which he knows nothing.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, throughout this article there are statements made by the newspaper reporter which represent as speaking the sentiments, if not the very words, of the President and of the Secretary of State.

Mr. LODGE. Well, Mr. President, last week the same newspaper stated that my motion to go into secret session was made after consulting with the President in view of shutting off public information, and the Senator from New Jersey and myself had made a careful canvass of the Senate to see that it was done. If this statement is as accurate as those statements, I think it is a rather doubtful form of assumption.

Mr. BACON. I will call the honorable Senator's attention to the fact that this particular paper which I now hold in my hand represents that the President and Secretary of State denied the authenticity of that statement.

Mr. LODGE. Well, Mr. President, what the same paper said last week, which I presume the Senator will now recognize is not correct, seems to me to impair its absolute certainty as a foundation for an assumption.

Mr. BACON. I had not assumed it as an absolute certainty.

Mr. LODGE. The Senator is assuming that the Secretary of State has been disrespectful to the Senate. I say that is an assumption no one has a right to make.

Mr. BACON. There might be a difference between the honorable Senator and myself as to whether what is contained here is disrespectful. I did not assume that. I said I would assume, and I thought I could fairly assume, that this publication was by his authority and under the statement made by him. Then, as to whether or not it is disrespectful is a matter for each Senator to determine for himself.

But I did not rise for the purpose of making specifically a charge against the Secretary of State with a view of bringing him to judgment in this tribunal as to whether or not he has been disrespectful. I think, however, if the Secretary of State is responsible for what appears in this article, it could properly be suggested in the most respectful language that it is not respectful to the Senate.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. BACON. I do.

Mr. TILLMAN. I wish to suggest that we could very easily settle this whole question in five minutes. When I introduced here a couple of weeks ago, or something like that, an article from the New York Herald which contained very serious imputations upon certain transactions in Panama, the Senator from Massachusetts felt so much concern that he went to the telephone and in a moment came in and in the most emphatic manner said upon the authority of the Secretary of War he pronounced the statement a lie. The same course is now open to him; the telephone is working, and with all due deference to the Senator, I think it would be entirely apropos that the Secretary of State, for whom I have the most profound admiration and respect, should be permitted now and instantly to clear himself from the supposition that in the slightest way he has done anything or permitted anything disrespectful to the Senate, because I do not believe he has done it.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President——

Mr. TILLMAN. But, if the Senator from Massachusetts will pardon me, we have fallen into such a condition in the relationship between the Executive and the Senate that I am prepared for almost any exhibition of disrespect as well as usurpation in that quarter.

Mr. LODGE. Will the Senator from Georgia allow me, as the Senator from South Carolina addressed me?

Mr. BACON. Certainly.

Mr. LODGE. I should certainly not show so little respect either for myself or for the Secretary of State as to invite him to enter on the office of publicly denying every unauthorized statement that appears in any newspaper. In the second place, Mr. President, I should be debarred from doing so in public, because the Senate has ordered that this subject should not be discussed in public, and I desire to conform to the rules of the Senate.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, the Senate has not so ordered. There was but one thing in the resolution which I introduced and which the Senate has committed to its secret deliberations and consideration and determination, and that was the question whether or not we should ask of the Executive certain information. That resolution, Mr. President, did not express any opinion as to the Moroccan question. It expressed no opinion as to the propriety of the appointment of delegates. It expressed no opinion as to the propriety of our being represented at that conference. It simply asked for certain information from the President.

I am not here pressing that we shall ask for information from the President. I am not discussing the question as to the propriety of asking information of the President, and I do not propose to do that. I may not either now or hereafter revive that question, because it is a matter entirely within the control of the majority of the Senate, and it is fruitless when a majority oppose a thing of that kind, or if it should be opposed to it, for the minorty to continue to press it.

But, Mr. President, there is nothing in that resolution, there is nothing in the order of the Senate with reference to it, which debars the Senate from the consideration, in the first place, of a great abstract proposition, as expressed in the resolution which I have introduced to-day, or which will debar the Senate from a proper consideration of the question whether the particular instance now being developed in the history of this country is one which is applicable to that particular policy of this Government, and whether that particular instance is or is not in contravention of that policy.

So, Mr. President, with all due respect to the honorable Senator from Massachusetts, I must differ from him in the suggestion that there is anything in the resolution which I have submitted, or in the remarks which I propose to submit thereon, which contravenes the order of the Senate. There has been no decision on the part of the Senate that it would consider this subject in secret. As I have said before, I am not discussing any communication from the Executive. I am not discussing any subject upon which the Executive has communicated to us directly or indirectly. There was nothing in the annual message of the President on the subject, nor has there been any special communication to us on the subject. We are as free as we are upon any other question which relates to the interests of this Government. In discussing it there is nothing confidential in our possession.

Mr. President, I was proceeding to say, when I was interrupted by the Senator from Massachusetts, that I thought I might safely assume that this article was published by the authority of the Secretary of State and upon the basis of information received from the Secretary of State. Not only does the article set out the statement that in the interview, which was evidently for the purpose of conveying information to the newspaper reporter, the Secretary of State unhesitatingly showed him all these papers which have been withheld from the Senate, but there is also a general discussion of the subject of the Moroccan conference, and in that general discussion there is a statement and a repetition of the statement in more than one instance of what is said by the Secretary of State and also by the President, as well as a general statement of their views, as definitely ascertained, and not as in any manner surmised or guessed at.

Unless, sir, we are prepared to believe, which I do not, that the reporter of the Washington Post has falsified or misrepresented what occurred, we have every reason to believe from the statement made by him that these statements were made upon the authority of the Secretary of State. For this reason, while I do not assert it as a fact, I feel justified in assuming that what is published in this article has been written and published by the authority of the Secretary of State.

Now, what is the information conveyed to us in this newspaper excerpt from which I have read? It professes to give a statement of a part of what is the history of the appointment of delegates to the Algeciras conference, and then that part that it does not give it informs us each and any Senator can get if he will respectfully go to the State Department and ask permission to be allowed to see the papers.

As the Senator is talking about respect, I will not say that is an affront to the Senate or that it is an indignity to the Senate, but I will venture in all respect to the Secretary of State, for whom, like the Senator from South Carolina, I have a very profound respect and admiration—I will in that deferential and respectful manner, suggest that withholding the papers from the Senate, even though desired by a minority of Senators, and a display of them to newspaper reporters, and the information conveyed to the Senate, not in the ordinary official channel, but through the newspaper press, that if any Senator will go to the State Department and there humbly, hat in hand, ask permission to see these papers, he will be allowed to do so, is not respectful to the Senate. I shall be very much gratified to be authoritatively informed that the reporter misunderstood the Secretary of State.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. BACON. I do.

Mr. TILLMAN. I am sure the Senator from Georgia does not wish to do Mr. Root an injustice, and although it is none of my business, as the Senator from Massachusetts is here as the representative and defender of Cabinet officers, and I would not by any means be suspected of interfering with his pleasant work, I feel constrained to say the Senator is doing Secretary Root an injustice, because the resolution has never been passed by the Senate—at least that is my understanding. Probably the Secretary, feeling that a tempest in a teapot had been stirred up in the Senate by his overzealous friends, has taken this means of showing how harmless would have been the passage of the resolution of the Senator from Georgia and how little would have come out of it. That seems to be a commonsense view. I may be in error.

Mr. BACON. That may be true, Mr. President, and I am very glad to accept the suggestion that possibly the Secretary of State designed it as a rebuke to his officious friends on the other side of the Chamber. I understand that to be the suggestion of the Senator from South Carolina.

Mr. TILLMAN. It seems to me that that is the only logical and reasonable explanation of the action of the Secretary of State if he did give this information to the Post newspaper; and I have no doubt that he did.

Mr. BACON. I am very much obliged to the Senator from South Carolina for the suggestion, because there is another road out of the dilemma. Not only will we be relieved if the Senator from Massachusetts will have the information conveyed to us that this report is not the representation of what occurred between the reporter and the Secretary of State, but if it did occur that it was not regarded as a reflection upon the Senate, but as a rebuke to his friends on the other side of the Chamber who had put him in this awkward dilemma. In either case we shall be relieved, and I have no doubt that the Secretary of State will be very much gratified that he shall be relieved of such an imputation.

But, Mr. President, I did not rise for the purpose of making any special animadversion upon the Secretary of State. I rose for something of more grave importance I think; that is, to bring to the attention of the Senate, and through the Senate of the country, a consideration of the question whether or not this proposed conference at Algeciras (under the information which we have in common with the rest of the world, and which we do not enjoy from any confidential communication or any exclusive information) comports with the interest of this country, whether or not it is in accordance with the traditional time-honored policy of this Government, or whether in truth it is a most pronounced violation of the policy well defined and thoroughly established and of uninterrupted observance for more than a century. That is the question I wanted to bring to the consideration of the Senate and of the public, because I think it is a most vital one.

Mr. President, for a hundred years and more, for one hundred and ten years and more, it has been the announced and universally observed policy of this Government not to commit ourselves to any entanglements in European political or international affairs. Unless I am very much mistaken in my view as to what will be the necessary result of our participation in this conference, if this is recognized as a proper thing and becomes a precedent, then for all time in the future there can no possible international question come up in Europe when it will not be considered proper for us to participate in it and become entangled in it and be affected by its result and by the general policy which will therefrom result.

The resolution recites that this is a time-honored policy of more than a century. It had its origin in the Administration of Washington. The first treaty ever made by the United States with a foreign government was the treaty made in 1778, if I recollect correctly, between the United States and France. That treaty contained a provision of alliance, offensive and defensive, between the United States and France, the only one we ever did make, and I hope the only one we ever will make. In 1793, either in the closing of Washington's first Administration or in the beginning of his second, I am not sure which, France called upon the United States to make good its pledge, and there was a great controversy in this country as to whether or not in compliance with that pledge we should go to war with England, with which power France was then at war. There was great diversity of opinion. Washington's Cabinet was divided upon it. Finally Washington sided with Hamilton and Randolph and himself took the position that we should not engage in foreign wars at the behest and will and in the interest of a foreign country. In consequence of that decision the obligation of that treaty was directly repudiated by the Government of the United States and we refused to take part in the war between France and Great Britain.

That policy had never theretofore been announced in any State paper, it had never been announced as the policy of this Government, and the first time, so far as I know, that it was ever formally presented is in Washington's Farewell Address.

Mr. President, I could get a great number of utterances by public men upon this subject, but I have not had time this morning to collect them. The article which has called this matter to my attention and made me feel the importance of bringing it more directly to the attention of the Senate appeared only yesterday morning, Sunday, when I had no opportunity to have access to libraries. But in Washington's Farewell Address, which we read here on the 22d of every February, occurs this, directly in accord with the position taken by him with reference to the French treaty:

> Europe has a set of primary interests which to us have none or a very remote relation. Hence she must be engaged in frequent controversies, the causes of which are essentially foreign to our concerns. Hence, therefore, is must be unwise in us to implicate ourselves by artificial ties in the ordinary vicissitudes of her politics or the ordinary combinations and collisions of her friendships or enmities.
> Our detached and distant situation invites and enables us to pursue a different course. If we remain one people, under an efficient government, the period is not far off when we may defy material injury from external annoyance; when we may take such an attitude as will cause the neutrality we may at any time resolve upon to be scrupulously respected; when belligerent nations, under the impossibility of making acquisitions upon us, will not legally hazard the giving us provocation; when we may choose peace or war, as our interests, guided by justice, shall counsel.
> Why forego the advantages of so peculiar a situation? Why quit our own to stand upon foreign ground? Why, by interweaving our destiny with that of any part of Europe, entangle our peace and prosperity in the toils of European ambition, rivalship, interest, humor, or caprice?

That is from Washington's Farewell Address. In the message of President Monroe, in which he announced what is now known as the "Monroe doctrine," Mr. Monroe also used similar language, a part of which I will read. Said he:

> In the wars of the European powers in matters relating to themselves we have never taken any part, nor does it comport with our policy so to do. Our policy in regard to Europe, which was adopted at an early stage of the wars which have so long agitated that quarter of the globe, nevertheless remains the same, which is, not to interfere in the internal concerns of any of its powers; to consider the government de facto as the legitimate government for us; to cultivate friendly relations with it, and to preserve those relations by a frank, firm, and manly policy, meeting in all instances the just claims of every power, submitting to injuries from none.

In the succeeding annual message by Monroe the same doctrine is as emphatically stated by him, as follows:

> Separated as we are from Europe by the great Atlantic Ocean, we can have no concern in the wars of the European governments nor in the causes which produce them. The balance of power between them, into whichever scale it may turn in its various vibration, can not affect us. It is the interest of the United States to preserve the most friendly relations with every power, and on conditions fair, equal, and applicable to all.

Mr. President, I might not only give these utterances, but in unnumbered instances could I call to the attention of the Senate the utterances of our Presidents and of our Secretaries of State, of our publicists, and of our great men of all parties, enunciating the same doctrine and advocating adherence to the same policy. But it is scarcely necessary that I should take up the time of the Senate to do so, when in a general way they are so well known to all. From the day of Washington to the present time the doctrine of noninterference and nonentanglement in the international political controversies of Europe has been uniformly and continuously held by all Administrations and by all political parties in the United States, and it has become the fixed policy, the unwritten law as it were, of this country, recognized, advocated, respected, and obeyed by all.

While not taking the time to read these many utterances, I will read something which is extremely pertinent to the suggestion which I am just making as to the continuity and uninterrupted observance of this policy. I will read an extract from the proceedings of The Hague conference, showing the attitude of the United States as announced most formally there. When we so recently met with the nations of the world in that great conference, in the interest of peace and to discourage war and rob war of its atrocities, fearing that indirectly even our adherence to an agreement of such a character might be construed into an abandonment of this time-honored policy, this provision was inserted:

> And whereas the said convention was signed by the plenipotentiaries of the United States of America under reservation of the following declaration.

That is a part of the proclamation of the President announcing the making of this treaty, and this is the language of the reservation made by the delegates of the United States when they signed the peace treaty at The Hague:

> Nothing contained in this convention—

This is The Hague convention—

> Nothing contained in this convention shall be so construed as to require the United States of America to depart from its traditional policy of not intruding upon, interfering with, or entangling itself in the political questions of policy or internal administration of any foreign state; nor shall anything contained in the said convention be construed to imply a relinquishment by the United States of America of its traditional attitude toward purely American questions.

This is as strong and distinct an enunciation of the position and policy of the United States on this subject as has been uttered by any one of our Presidents, or in any State paper which ever has been issued, or in any speech that has ever been made in Congress on the subject. I will read it again that we may weigh the words.

> Nothing contained in this convention shall be so construed as to require the United States of America to depart from its traditional policy—> of not intruding upon, interfering with, or entangling itself in the political questions of policy or internal administration of any foreign state.

Mr. President, if the question whether or not the United States should take part in the Algeciras conference had then been before any body charged with its consideration, could the language descriptive of what should be done in observance of this policy be more accurate than that language is? Although intended as general language, could it be applied more specifically to any case than it can be and must be applied to the particular case before us? "Intruding upon, interfering with, or entangling itself in the political questions of policy or internal administration of any foreign state." That is the specific reservation we made in the adherence to the Hague treaty.

Now, is this participation in the Algeciras conference, in this language, "intruding upon, interfering with, or entangling" the United States "in the political questions of policy or internal administration of any foreign state?" What words more apt than these could be found to describe our action when we meet in conference the delegates of the nations of Europe to determine what shall be the European power which by virtue and authority of that conference shall hereafter dominate and control the political future of Morocco!

Mr. President, what gives rise to this Algeciras conference? The history of it is known to us all. France, having a contiguous territory, feeling that she has peculiar interests in Morocco, entered into an agreeement with Great Britain and with other powers particularly interested in the Mediterranean—those contiguous to and bordering on its shores—by which she should have thereafter a controlling influence, a political influence and domination, in Morocco. Germany took offense; but I will not go through the details, which are known to us. I will state that the issue raised between Germany and France made such a tension as to threaten war. It drove the prime minister of France out of office, and it was only by so doing that war was averted. It is a question of that magnitude and of that menace to the peace of Europe—one which, if it caused war, would embroil, in all probability, all the great powers of Europe.

Then, in order that the matter might be settled amicably, if possible, it was arranged that this conference should be had. While there are minor questions in it, as the whole world knows, the great question to come before the conference at Algeciras is as to whether France shall have a political control and domination in Morocco or whether, as contended by Germany, that political control shall be shared by her with Germany and other European powers. When we needlessly participate in the consideration of this question between these irritated and rival nations we enter into a dynamite storehouse.

Mr. President, I say that is a question particularly and exclusively a European question. That is a controversy exclusively relative to European politics. That is a question which does not concern us. It is a question which may be settled in a way to bring peace. It is a question which may be determined in a way to result in war. All Europe recognizes the fact. All the press of Europe to-day is teeming with the question whether the result of the Algeciras conference will bring peace or bring war. The European governments are marshaling their forces and concentrating their fleets with reference to the fact that it may bring war.

Mr. President, I hope and believe that war will not result; I hope and believe that peace will come out of it; but I think that while of course we desire that there should be peace and hope that there shall be peace, so far as the United States Government is concerned, if it shall participate in that conference and if there shall be peace as the result of it, our participation will be more disastrous to us in the long run than if war should come out of it. Why? Because if war results from it, it will be taken as a lesson. It will be said, "We should not have participated in this conference, and here is the result of it." It will be a warning as to the future. On the contrary, if peace results, especially if we ourselves should be instrumental in securing so desirable a result, then it will be said, "Behold the benefit of our entangling ourselves in foreign matters, of our participating in the settlement of foreign controversies," and thereafter for all time, whenever a complication arises in Europe growing out of controversies of an international character between European powers, we will be expected to take part in it, forsooth, to assist in arriving at a conclusion one way or the other.

Mr. President, I am reluctant to detain the Senate; but there are one or two things that I wish to suggest it is proper that we should consider and that the public should consider. It is suggested that this is premature; that the President of the United States has the right to enter upon negotiations for the purpose of making a treaty, and that until such treaty is made and submitted to the Senate there can be no possible propriety in the Senate or the House asking any question of the President relative thereto; that it is an encroachment upon his prerogatives, that it is an intrustion upon his domain, that it is not entirely respectful to the President.

I grant that is in a measure true, or at least that there is room for such contention, as to any matter where the negotiation is looking to the making of a treaty, as to a matter which is within treaty jurisdiction, but I respectfully submit and urge that the main question to which I have alluded which will be before the Algeciras conference is not a question within the treaty jurisdiction of the United States.

Of course I know, as every other one knows, that there is no limit in the Constitution of the United States upon the treaty-making power of the President and of the Senate. There is no limitation whatever. There could be, so far as the Constitution of the United States goes, a treaty between the United States and Germany by which it should be guaranteed that we would see to it that France should not have a controlling influence in Morocco. But while that would not be a violation of the Constitution of the United States, it would be a violation of a policy of this Government which has become as binding in its operation as if it were in the Constitution of the United States until the people of the United States themselves shall see fit to decree to the contrary.

There are two policies known to our Government which are not found in the Constitution of the United States, but which have practically become law. Of course such laws can not be enforced in the courts, but they are obligatory upon the political departments of the Government. The constitution of Great Britain is not a written constitution, and yet there are certain principles, certain policies, known to that constitution in Great Britain which are as binding upon the Parliament of Great Britain as if there were a written constitution expressly providing for such principles and such policies, and it is only when the question has been submitted to the people and decided upon by them in a general election that Parliament feels at liberty to change what is the recognized constitution of Great Britain.

We have a written Constitution, but we have, in addition to the written Constitution, these two principles of public policy, which have become ingrafted as a part of the unwritten constitution of this country, two policies which have become recognized as of authority, two policies so long and so well established that no Executive and no Congress has the right to depart therefrom except the authority so to do is received from the people in an election where that is the issue. I do not recognize that any unwritten law can amend or repeal any provision of the written Constitution; but when, by all Administrations, by all parties, by all the people, a policy not inconsistent with the written Constitution has been upheld and recognized for a century, that policy may be considered as a part of our unwritten constitution and binding as such.

Now, what are those two policies? One is the Monroe doctrine. The Monroe doctrine, until it shall have been decreed otherwise by the people themselves when they have an opportunity to so decide in elections when that question shall be in issue, is just as much the law of this land as the written Constitution of the United States.

Mr. ALDRICH. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question right there?

Mr. BACON. With much pleasure.

Mr. ALDRICH. Whose understanding of the Monroe doctrine is to obtain as a law?

Mr. BACON. That is a political question, and of course it must be decided by the political department of the Government. When I say that Congress has no right to change it, I am not speaking of the decision as to how it should be properly interpreted. That rests in a man's conscience. I am speaking of a deliberate and an intentional setting aside of any provision of the Monroe doctrine as the Congress that sets it aside may understand it. I speak of it as Congress understands it, and within the conscience of each Senator and Representative making up that Congress it is the law to him, because it is the well-settled and well-understood policy of this Government. While it does not require that it should be changed in the manner that is prescribed in the Constitution for a constitutional change, there is none the less the great moral obligation upon every department of the Government to observe it until the people, in the method which they are authorized to pursue to change it, shall indicate to the Executive and to Congress their will that it shall be so changed.

Again, Mr. President, we have another great policy which belongs to the unwritten constitution of the United States, and that great policy is the one we are discussing to-day, the one first announced by Washington, a policy recognized by every Administration from that day to this, a policy advocated by every public man of prominence—if there is an exception, I do not now recall it—that we should avoid entangling alliances and that we should not be committed to controversies of an international character between European powers.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. BACON. Certainly.

Mr. LODGE. I have listened with great interest to the Senator's eloquent defense of the Farewell Address of Washington.

Mr. BACON. That is very kind.

Mr. LODGE. Who is departing from it?

Mr. BACON. I hope the Senator will permit me a word to thank him for the compliment.

Mr. LODGE. Who has departed from it?

Mr. BACON. I say this will be a departure from it.

Mr. LODGE. What will be?

Mr. BACON. What I am arguing.

Mr. LODGE. Who has departed from it? That is what I want to get at.

Mr. BACON. We have not departed from it yet.

Mr. LODGE. Then what is the purpose?

Mr. BACON. But if we go into the Algeciras conference——

Mr. LODGE. Is this merely a warning?

Mr. BACON. No; it is not merely a warning.

Mr. LODGE. This is to keep us from violating it?

Mr. BACON. If possible.

Mr. LODGE. The point of the Senator's remarks is to keep us from violating it?

Mr. BACON. If possible.

Mr. LODGE. I am glad to know the object of it.

Mr. BACON. I am very unfortunate. I know that I am not very happy in the ability to express clearly my ideas, and with the Senator's well-known great and acute intellect of course when he does not understand it it must be the fault of the speaker. It could not possibly be suggested otherwise, and it is extremely mortifying to a speaker when he happens to fall under the very great misfortune of not being understood by the learned and distinguished and honorable Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. BACON. With pleasure.

Mr. LODGE. I merely want to say that I knew, of course, the Senator had some great object in what he was saying, and that the fault was undoubtedly mine. I wanted only to know what the object was. Now I have found out that the object is to save the country from violating Washington's Farewell Address.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, it is not simply Washington's Farewell Address. It is to save the country from the violation of the policy announced in Washington's Farewell Address, which has been the universally observed and recognized policy from that day to this. I will take the privilege of saying that the repeated assertion of the honorable Senator that he has not so far understood me adds to the mortification which I feel and the consciousness that I have not properly expressed myself. But, sir, the character of this colloquy does not comport with the gravity of the subject I am discussing.

Mr. LODGE. I understood what the Senator was saying. I did not understand before why he was saying it. Now I understand he is trying to preserve the great policy of the Government, which nobody has violated.

Mr. BACON. Possibly, then, I should be relieved somewhat of the humiliation and the mortification when the Senator kindly observed that he had not understood me, that so far he has not made application of what I said.

Mr. LODGE. That was it.

Mr. BACON. I was endeavoring to make the application, and I shall proceed to do it in the very great hope that I may have the ability to state it in a way in which the Senator may properly understand it.

Mr. LODGE. I hope so.

Mr. BACON. And if he fails to understand it I know it will be due to my imperfection and not to his want of ability to thoroughly understand it.

Mr. President, to resume after the somewhat lengthy digression which has been occasioned by the facetious remarks of my honorable friend, I was endeavoring to make the application. The principle is that we shall not engage in any entanglements by participating in any conference which relates exclusively to a European controversy or a European issue or question. I was illustrating it. I had passed that by, however; but in view of the suggestion of the honorable Senator I shall return to it to the extent of stating it, in order that I may if possible escape the calamity of being misunderstood. I may possibly have been misunderstood by some other Senator. I have endeavored to show (and I only return to it because of the very serious suggestion of the Senator from Massachusetts that I had not expressed myself intelligibly) that this question is exclusively a European question. It matters not to us whether France has a controlling power in Morocco or whether she shares it with Germany.

[At this point Mr. BACON was interrupted by the expiration of the morning hour, and the unfinished business was informally laid aside that he might conclude.]

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, I will endeavor not to intrude upon the courtesy of the Senate at any great length. I simply desire to continue the direct line of thought upon which I was in the attempt at least to express, and when I have finished that I shall leave the subject, although it is a very broad one and I think is a very vital one, one which is to affect us unfortunately in the next hundred years or for all future time through a departure from the policy, as we have been affected advantageously in the past hundred years by an observance of it.

I was saying, Mr. President, that the question which relates to the political control of Morocco is necessarily a European question with which we have no right to interfere and with which it is not our interest to interfere.

Resuming the thread of my remarks where they were interrupted, I repeat that it is within the authority, of course, of the treaty-making power to make a treaty with all the other powers of Europe, or with any one power of Europe, relative to the political control of any particular part of Europe by any other part or any other government of Europe, but that while it is thus within the written Constitution, it would be in violation of that which I have denominated a part of the unwritten Constitution of the United States, which prohibits us from entering upon entangling alliances or participating in controversies purely political between European governments.

I had said that if there will result peace from this conference, as I think there will, while of course it would be gratifying to all lovers of humanity that there should be such a result, and while we desire such a result, it would have an unfortunate effect for the United States, because in a case where war resulted it would be an object lesson which would deter us in the future, and if peace resulted it will be pointed to as a reason why there is no danger in such political entanglements and we should engage in them in the future.

Mr. President, there is but one single ground upon which there can be, in my opinion, any defense made of our participation in the Algeciras conference; that is, as to its relation to our commercial interests and to the protection of our citizens there or those in whom we may be interested. As to that I desire to make two remarks. First, if it is the fact that our commercial interests are involved, and that be the ground of our interference, then there can be no possible conference between political powers in Europe relating to the political control of any part of Europe in which there will not be found the same warrant for our interference. The political control of a country necessarily exercises an influence on the business of such country, and in every instance of such a political conference it will be found for the same reasons and in the same way that we have commercial interests which are involved, because we have commercial interests in every country in Europe, and with every one of them, even the least of them, in larger degree than we have with the semibarbaric country of Morocco.

If that were the principle or the test by which we should be guided, then the policy of noninterference, of nonentanglement, would have been destroyed a hundred years ago; and the policy of noninterference and nonentanglement was made in view and in full recognition of the fact that we had such commercial relations with every other country, and the principle was adopted and has been adhered to by the United States for more than a hundred years in full knowledge of the fact and of the consequences involved in such fact.

The policy, Mr. President, is not a limited one. It is not a conditional one. It is an absolute policy as it has existed heretofore. It was not a policy that we should not become entangled in European controversies of a political character except in cases where we might have commercial interests in the country. It was a policy that we should not thus become entangled in any country of Europe, whether we had commercial interests there or not. It was not a policy that recognized as an exception that we should become entangled in political controversies in Europe in a case where by our assistance we might prevent a European war. If such were the policy, then there could be no conference called in Europe for the settlement of political controversies but what the exception would prevail, because there is no conference called with reference to a political question but what it is a conference called in the interest of peace and for the purpose of avoiding war. Therefore in every such we would be called upon to interfere on the ground that by so doing we could avert war and accomplish good.

It is an absolute unconditioned policy, for the highest and best of reasons that even though we may accomplish good, even though we may secure peace and avert war, nevertheless we shall refrain from entanglements in these conventions, because our highest and first duty is to guard the interests of our own country.

So I might go on and illustrate as to all other matters. It is not a policy that we shall refrain when we can not accomplish good and that we shall participate when we can accomplish good. It is a policy that we shall refrain at all times, whether we can accomplish good or not.

Now, Mr. President, to hasten to a conclusion so as not to impose upon the courtesy of the Senate, in what particular does the commercial interest of the United States in Morocco differentiate the present situation from any other situation where there shall be called a European conference with a view to the settlement of political disputes, and where the country out of which the questions arise has commercial relations with us? In what particular does the Moroccan commercial interest or the interest of the United States in Morocco differ from any other interest which will arise and which must necessarily exist in all cases where European countries meet together for the purpose of settling their peculiar international political differences? The only difference is one that accentuates the utter want of necessity of any participation by us in this matter.

Mr. SPOONER. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Wisconsin?

Mr. BACON. I always do, with pleasure.

Mr. SPOONER. What conferences abroad, if any, would the Senator consider it proper for the United States to send representatives to, on his theory?

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, the question is an extremely pertinent one, and in response I will say to the Senator I think there are conferences in which the United States should be a party. I think, for instance, The Hague conference was one occasion when it was entirely proper for the United States to participate with the other civilized nations of the world, and I think that the United States were extremely prudent and guided by a proper action when they put in the proviso that nothing therein contained should be construed as committing this Government to the policy of intruding upon or interfering with any matter connected with a European international controversy.

I will say to the Senator, in order that I may give concrete instances and not have to confine myself to an abstract reply, that the conference of 1880 between the European powers and Morocco was an eminently proper one, because that did not relate to the question of the political control of Morocco. That had nothing to do with any international European controversy. It related solely to the question of the rights and privileges which should be granted to the subjects or citizens of other countries resident in Morocco, as to the privileges of ministers and consuls and their retinues, and as to the right of persons engaged in certain commercial pursuits there, and particularly as to the right or privilege of each one of those nations to the most favored treatment that any nation received in commercial matters at the hands of Morocco. That was an eminently proper occasion for the United States to meet with the European nations and agree upon what treaty should be made with this semibarbaric country. There was there no question of international politics. There was no controversy between European nations which might lead to war. There was no question as to the control of Morocco politically by any other country commercially or in any other way.

If the Senator will consider that as a sufficient answer I will not detain the Senate by giving other concrete examples or abstract examples. I think that my reply so far made sufficiently illustrates not only those two concrete cases, but the classes of cases where it was proper for the United States to interfere.

But I will pause long enough to say in a general way that I think it entirely proper for the United States to join in a conference which relates to the regulation of commercial matters, which relates to anything outside of politics, which has no connection with controversies for dominion and power relatively between two great countries as in this case, or in a conference which has no relation to the great question of the balance of power in Europe, the great question which to-day keeps the great countries of Europe each an armed camp with its three hundred thousand and five hundred thousand armed men, a question with which, if we become connected, the time is only too short in our future when we also must be prepared to face the world in arms, in the maintenance of questions which now do not concern us but in the settlement of which we will then have the same obligation as the European nations now have.

But, Mr. President, to return, at the time the Senator interrogated me very properly, I was asking the question what differentiates this particular conference from any other conference which might be called in Europe for the settlement of European or international questions or controversies, when the fact exists that in each one of them there are and always will be commercial interests of the United States to be guarded, and which might rightfully and properly be said to be necessarily affected by whatever might be decided by such conference.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. BACON. I will yield with pleasure, although I shall have to return again to the same point.

Mr. McCUMBER. May I ask a question or two of the Senator that I do not think have yet been answered? If they were answered, it was when I was not present.

Mr. BACON. Very well.

Mr. McCUMBER. I should like to ask the Senator whether he has any information that would justify the inference that the delegates selected to attend the Moroccan convention will go outside of what he declares is the settled policy of the country—that is, that they will take any part whatever in the discussion of the policing of that country or as to which power shall be the dominant power; and if there is no information to justify that inference, then I should like to ask the Senator another question.

Mr. BACON. Will the Senator permit me to answer one at a time?

Mr. McCUMBER. Very well; but this is connected with it, and the Senator can answer them both together. If there is nothing to justify that inference, then the next question is this: Suppose that we have treaty obligations with Morocco——

Mr. BACON. Now, I submit to the Senator that those are two questions, and must necessarily be answered separately. But the Senator may go ahead.

Mr. McCUMBER. Suppose we had, as it is assumed we have, a commercial treaty with Morocco, and suppose that in the settlement of this other matter the question of keeping the open door in Morocco should be discussed as between the powers, would not we be justified in sending delegates there for the very purpose of discussing that subject, and to prevent, if possible, any interference with our treaty rights or with our commercial interests?

Mr. BACON. If the Senator will permit me, I will endeavor to answer what I think are practically three questions propounded by him; and if I do not answer them, I hope he will do me the kindness to call my attention to anything I may omit, as I must bear his several questions in mind while I am endeavoring to answer one.

The Senator, as I understand, asks the question, What evidence there is that these delegates are to engage in any part of this conference relative to the political control of Morocco, or as to any of the political questions which are dividing some countries of Europe and about which they are in controversy? That is the question of the Senator?

Mr. McCUMBER. Yes.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, unfortunately we have no evidence of that fact, because we have received no information from the executive department as to what are the instructions of these delegates. Even, however, if the suggestion contained in the question of the Senator is correct, that our delegates are limited to questions of a commercial character, or rather that their instructions do not extend to participation in any conference relative to political questions, nevertheless there are several reasons why we should not be in this conference.

As I have previously said, there can be no conference in Europe as to international European political questions which concern any country in Europe which will not relate to a country with which we have commercial relations. Therefore, if the rule is to be laid down that wherever we have commercial relations with the countries in Europe and a political controversy grows up in Europe as to the political control of that country between the nations of Europe, and war is threatened on account of that political controversy and a conference is to be called for the purpose of settling the controversy, and, if possible, of avoiding war—if that rule is to be laid down then a conference can not at any time be called in Europe upon any political international European question which will not call for our participation also, because we will always have these commercial questions there which can be affected by the result of such a conference; and in consequence, as I have already endeavored to show, if this were recognized as a sufficient reason for participating in such conferences the precedent would be established which would require us to participate in all future European conferences called for the settlement of European political questions.

Mr. SPOONER. Let me ask the Senator a question.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Wisconsin?

Mr. BACON. With pleasure.

Mr. SPOONER. Suppose that be true, and our delegates to such a conference are limited absolutely to the questions or subjects of interest to the United States, what is the objection to that? Let me put another question.

Mr. BACON. Which one shall I answer first?

Mr. SPOONER. Answer them together. Does the Senator conceive it to be impossible, or at all difficult, where a conference is to be held that involves questions of interest to the United States and also questions of purely European interests, that the representatives of the United States may attend, and properly attend, that conference, and after having looked to the interests of the United States withdraw from it? Is that inconceivable?

Mr. BACON. I will take the first question, or answer both together.

Mr. SPOONER. Does the Senator conceive it impossible that the representatives of the United States may properly attend a foreign conference which deals with questions affecting the interests of the United States and also with European interests, limited in their powers to a consideration only of American interests, and instructed that when that is concluded they shall withdraw?

Mr. BACON. Mr. President——

Mr. SPOONER. If the Senator will pardon me one observation, on his doctrine, or his argument, in all cases and with all countries with which we have commercial interests and concern we would keep away from all conferences.

Mr. BACON. No; all political conferences.

Mr. SPOONER. Oh! But suppose it is both commercial and political. Is the Senator's argument that where both are combined we should keep entirely away?

Mr. BACON. Yes.

Mr. SPOONER. And that we should attend only those conferences across the sea where there is involved nothing but our commercial interests?

It will often happen, as it has happened before and happens now, perhaps, that a conference is called, which involves directly the commercial interests or treaty interests of the United States and also involves European political questions with which we have no concern. On the Senator's theory we should stay away from such a conference and leave American interests to go uncared for, rather than act on the theory, which seems to be a sound one, that we may attend it with perfect propriety, and when American interests are disposed of withdraw from it, taking no part whatever in the controversy as to European policies. Now, is not that a fair statement of the situation in this transaction so far as the Senator knows it?

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, the Senator has asked such a number of questions, and has made comments upon them, that I can only answer in a general way, because it is not possible to answer specifically questions put with such complement of argument—sound argument, or, rather, plausible argument, if he will pardon my so denominating it.

Mr. SPOONER. The Senator will pardon me——

Mr. BACON. I always enjoy the interruptions of the Senator, even if the Senator prevails in the argument. I then have consolation in the consciousness of having been overthrown by an Ajax and not by one of small prowess.

Mr. SPOONER. I have rather a poor memory, Mr. President, and I fail to recall any time when the Senator admitted I had prevailed when there was a controversy with him. [Laughter.]

Mr. BACON. Probably that excuses the generous indisposition of the Senator to recognize that fact himself in my case, but in my struggles with him it might have been so recognized by others less magnanimous than he.

But, Mr. President, that brings me back really to what I was saying in response to the inquiries of the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER]. Here is a proposition, that if the controversy is a political controversy and relates to a country with which we have commercial interests and if the fact of the existence of such commercial interests is to determine the question whether we are to be parties to a conference, then there can be no conference in Europe with reference to a political controversy that will not call for our participation, at least in part, because there is no country about which a controversy can arise in Europe with which we have no commercial relations.

Mr. SPOONER. Mr. President——

Mr. BACON. If the Senator will pardon me, I will yield to him later in the fullest degree. I assure him of that. I wish him to allow me to state my proposition before I am compelled to break it in two.

The conclusion from that proposition is this: The avoidance of entanglement in European political controversies is so important, and the evils of participation in a conference over political controversies of an international European character are so great, and in consequence the necessity for the observance of the rule of nonentanglement is so imperative, that unless it can be shown to be utterly impossible to accomplish that result in any other way it would be unwise for us to participate in any European conferences which will endanger our being entangled in those controversies.

We have before had conferences in Europe, but they have always related to countries with which we had commercial interests; they have always related to countries with which we had tenfold more interest than we have or ever will have in Morocco; and yet the proposition has never before been advanced in the Congress of the United States, or in this branch of it, that because of that fact when European governments met together in conference for the purpose of settling the question of the political control of any part of Europe we should be there as a part of that conference for the purpose of protecting our commercial interests—never. If the suggestion of the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER] and the contention of the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. SPOONER] are to be adopted as the proper policy of the Government hereafter, the result of it must be that hereafter we must be parties to all political conferences in Europe, because they will always relate to countries in which we have commercial interests.

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. President——

Mr. BACON. If the Senator will pardon me until I finish my answer, then I will yield with pleasure. I will recall it to him if he does not remember it, and if he does not interrupt me for the purpose I will ask him to do so.

Mr. MORGAN. Very well.

Mr. BACON. In this particular instance there is absolutely no excuse for our going there for the protection of our commercial interests—that is, so far as we have information through the public press of the country, through dispatches from Europe, and the different statements as to what are the subjects-matter for consideration in this conference. We have every reason to rely upon what statements are made in the press as to these matters—these dispatches are from the great capitals of Europe—for the reason that these countries have not acted in secret as to what they proposed to do and as to what questions are to be under consideration at this conference.

France has issued a book (called the "Yellow Book") in which she has given the whole history of this matter from her standpoint, giving, as I am informed, all that she has done and all that she contends for. Germany has also issued a book (called there the "White Book") in which she has made public to the world every step that she has taken and every contention that she has made. Therefore, when the papers state that such and such are the provisions of the agreement of conference we have every reason to believe that these statements are reliable from the fact that they are not based on rumor, but are based upon the published reports of the Governments, which, unlike the Government of the United States, have made public to the world what they propose to do and what are the issues they propose to have settled. It is stated emphatically and not denied, and I have no doubt it is absolutely true, that the agreement to be submitted in this matter to the conference especially excepts from all power of consideration by that conference the question of any change in the commercial relations as settled by the treaty of 1880.

The treaty of 1880 between Morocco and almost all the civilized countries on the globe, all the leading powers of Europe and the United States included, expressly provides that each nation shall have in its commercial intercourse in Morocco the benefit of the most favored terms which shall be given to any other nation. There is a permanent treaty containing that guaranty; and this submission to that conference expressly provides that while the delegates sent to that conference may settle the question as to whether France shall have the predominant control in Morocco or whether Germany shall share in it, and while it may settle other questions of a political character, it shall not touch the consideration of the question of the commercial relations of any country with that Government as settled by the treaty of 1880. Now, what possible excuse can there be, in view of that, for our participation in this conference? If that were not there, there would be every opportunity for us to have acted as we did in 1880 in a conference which related exclusively to these personal and commercial matters, and not be mingled and mixed up and take part in these great European questions which threaten war. It is because it is known that this controversy threatens war that the powers are ostentatiously parading their military and naval strength, that armies are being concentrated on the frontier, and that all these nations, and, I am sorry to say, including the United States, are concentrating their fleets to-day at Gibraltar. There is a warlike pageant there to-day that has no part in the assembling of a peaceful conference to determine on matters of friendly commerce and trade.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President——

Mr. BACON. I promised I would yield in a moment to the Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN] and that I would call his attention to an interruption he desired to make, so I hope the Senator from Maine will excuse me for a moment.

Mr. MORGAN. I desire merely to make an inquiry of the Senator from Georgia or any other Senator. I want to know whether we have any authentic or official statement of any invitation for the Government of the United States to participate in this serious conference? Has that been brought to the attention of the Senate? I suppose, Mr. President, that the character of the invitation would, in a large measure, if not entirely, determine the character in which we accepted it, in which we are to be represented, and the purpose for which we are to be represented in that conference, if you call it such. Therefore I think the Senate ought to be informed of the nature of the invitation, so as to see whether it is proper for the President of the United States to accept it in full or to accept it in part, or whether the acceptance of it would create that state of entangling alliance with foreign European governments in respect particularly of political questions that we have always denounced in every action heretofore taken, more particularly in sending our delegates to the Panama conference.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Maine?

Mr. BACON. Will the Senator from Maine allow me to answer the question of the Senator from Alabama?

Mr. HALE. I am called from the Chamber, and desire to say only a few words.

Mr. BACON. I will yield to the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE] now, and will reply to the Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN] later.

Mr. HALE. I only desire to say, Mr. President, that I do not in the least regret this discussion. I think in all matters relating to not only action upon treaties submitted to the Senate, but upon grave considerations involving the negotiation of treaties, that the participation of the Senate was never by the framers of the Constitution intended to be shut out. I do not go so far as some Senators have gone in saying that until a treaty negotiated by the President is submitted to the Senate in terms the Senate shall stand dumb.

Mr. President, in that storehouse of information upon this subject, the Madison Papers—and the best form of those papers is the edition that was authorized by a resolution of Congress, edited by an eminent master of jurisprudence—whoever will go back to that fountain head of discussion and of consideration of all these great subjects, including the treaty-making power, will find that the participation of the Senate in all matters relating to treaties was most jealously guarded. Both Mr. Rutledge and Mr. Pinckney submitted the grave proposition that the entire treaty-making power should be left with the Senate. Mr. Dickinson and Doctor Franklin believed that it should be left to an Executive, with an executive council. Whoever examines that record and goes to the fountain head of information will find that the compromise, that was at last agreed upon by one vote of all the States, only came after a determined resistance on the part of the advocates of the power of the Senate, that the Senate should still be in sympathy with all subjects-matter attending foreign relations either before or after a treaty should be submitted.

It is said that we may trust the Executive. I think we may; but what would happen if at some time there was an Executive that we could not trust? What would happen if an Executive should desire to rehabilitate his own fortunes or build up the waning strength of his party by a war issue, and the Senate believed and was convinced that there was danger of that? Must the Senate wait until the mischief is done?

Mr. SPOONER. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Maine yield to the Senator from Wisconsin?

Mr. HALE. I do.

Mr. SPOONER. The Senator speaks outside of treaties. The Senator is not referring to treaties?

Mr. HALE. I am referring to steps that lead to treaties.

Mr. SPOONER. I should like to ask the Senator what would the Senate do in such a case?

Mr. HALE. I have no doubt, Mr. President, that if such a condition as that I have touched upon arose, and it was believed that an Executive for such reasons—they do not apply now, as I have indicated—was taking advantage of his power to commit the country to a war policy, I have no doubt that the Senate, in connection with the House of Representatives, could and would interfere by joint resolution and would not let that danger be presented to the lips of the Republic.

So, as I say, I do not go so far as some Senators do in believing that the Senate can do absolutely nothing until a treaty in form is launched before the Senate. But I am not troubled upon this matter now by any consideration of that kind. Under the administration of this Government as now conducted I do not believe that the Secretary of State, who has immediate charge of all these matters, will in any way involve this country, or let it be involved, in any of the controversies that will arise out of this conference between European powers. I think we may safely assume that the conservative interests of the country will be guarded in that respect, and that the Senator need have no alarm.

I wish—I am not hesitant in saying that I wish—that the Secretary of State and the President acting together had determined not to send delegates to this conference. The conference is, as the Senator from Georgia [Mr. BACON] says, not a conference called to meet commercial questions. It is a simon-pure outright political conference. It has given rise to great excitement; the European press has all been full of it, and, I am sorry to say, Mr. President, that our press has been full of it—a thing with which we have little or no concern, and the less concern that we have with it the better.

I do not find fault. I can see that the Secretary of State and the President, being called upon, as I think they were, by this little fought-over country of Morocco to send delegates, determined to send them. I can not speak for the President or the Secretary of State, but I should, if I made a guess, think that if the matter were to come up now, in view of the discussions, in view of all the conditions, the President and the Secretary of State would hesitate to send delegates to this conference. But they have gone there.

The danger, Mr. President, is not from the President nor from the Secretary of State. The danger of this whole business is the still ascending prominence of the war sentiment in the country. The President is not accountable for that; the Secretary of State is not accountable for that; we are not accountable for that.

I picked up a copy of this morning's Post, Mr. President, and I have it here. It is a newspaper which deserves all that has been said of it by the Senator from Georgia. It means to be a careful paper, and it is mainly a conservative paper; but the Washington Post this morning has more than a whole column showing that our danger of getting into these complications and getting into entangling alliances is not from the President nor from the Secretary of State nor from us, but from outside sentiment. More than a whole column is given to this Moroccan question, to what will come out of it, to the presence of our fleet at Gibraltar, and to the complications that will result. In the same paper, in a little inconspicuous place, is a notice of a common mine conference between all the operators of coal, all the representatives of the transportation of coal, and all the organizations that represent labor in the mining of coal and its transportation, but it is given no conspicuousness. Nobody thinks of that. The trouble is, Mr. President, that, under the incitement that the military sentiment is constantly pushing us forward to, with every officer of the Army and of the Navy eager and anxious for a complication that will bring us into war, the public attention is drifting away from the tremendous problems that at home are clutching at the foundation of our entire social and business and political fabric.

I hope to live long enough, it may be I shall not, when the obscure item which is given in the Post of this great meeting, involving all these great questions of coal transportation, of coal mining, and the interests of coal operators, the interests that labor has, will excite some attention, and that we will cease to give the best of our thought and our agitation to these foreign problems.

We have very little to do with Morocco. We could negotiate, if need be, another treaty with her in sixty days by sending commissioners for that purpose. In this conference between the European powers, who stand with hands at each other's throats, making an excuse for innovation and a policy that may mean war, the question of commerce will never have an ounce of consideration. The subject of commerce and of our commerce will never have the consideration of a moment in that conference. It is called for another purpose; the interest in it is in another purpose, and it would be much better if we kept our hands off of all such things.

I wanted to say this, and I want to say that I do not agree with the Senator in his apprehension that either the President or the Secretary of State is going to lead us into any trouble in this matter. The conservative instinct will take care of that. We shall get out of it without being entangled in the jealousies and strifes of the European powers. But I think this discussion itself is valuable, and I am very glad it has taken place.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, I have listened with great pleasure and interest to what the distinguished Senator from Maine has said. I agree with him in almost everything he has said, and I will indicate a little later wherein I unfortunately differ from him, as slight as that difference may be. I certainly agree with him decidedly as to the principles announced on all matters.

First, however, before responding to what was said by the distinguished Senator from Maine, I will reply to the inquiry of the learned Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN]. The Senator inquires whether we have any evidence of the nature of the invitation which has come to us for participation in this conference. I think it is extremely unfortunate, Mr. President—and I believe that every Senator who hears me thinks it is unfortunate—that the President had not taken us into his confidence when he sent his most elaborate message to the Senate at the beginning of this session, in which he treated of so vast a number of subjects.

It was extremely unfortunate that this most vital of all subjects, in my opinion, was not touched upon by him in his message, and I can only attribute his failure to do so to the fact that in the multitude of other matters he was not impressed with the importance of this step which he was about to take or had taken. I attribute it to no desire to withhold from the Congress of the United States information which it is proper to have and which the public should have. I say I think it is extremely unfortunate. I do not believe there is a Senator in the sound of my voice who does not agree with me now in that proposition, especially in view of the fact that the governments of Europe interested in this matter have without hesitation published to their countries and to the world everything that relates to the connection of each of their governments with this most important problem.

We are left to the information which we gather from other countries, and to the statement of newspaper correspondents of what has been given to them by the State Department. All I can state in answer definitely to the learned Senator from Alabama is in reading still further from the excerpt from which I read this morning from the Post, in which it is stated what is the character of the invitation which has been sent to this Government. The Senator will perceive that there is no invitation here to participate in any partial consideration. There is no invitation here to limit the action of the delegates of the United States to the consideration of commercial or personal questions; but it is a broad invitation to go into that conference on the same footing, and with the same powers, and with the same scope of duty as the delegates from the European countries thus vitally interested in the maintenance of the balance of power in Europe, and sensitive and alert even to the point of war in the prevention of undue advantage of any one country at the expense of the powers exercised by another.

I read further from the article from which I read this morning, beginning at the point where I left off. This article from the Washington Post appeared in yesterday's paper:

Examination of the correspondence shows that this Government was invited to participate in the conference by the Sultan of Morocco. The Mohammedan monarch was constrained to extend an invitation to the United States along with exactly worded invitations to all of the European nations of the first class, because this country was one of the signatories to the international agreement with Morocco in July, 1880, as the result of an international conference at Madrid, Spain, called at the request of the ruler of the Shereefian empire to bring his country within the pale of Christian civilization.

It is true that that statement is made as giving a reason why the invitation was the same to the United States as it was to the other countries, but that does not change the fact that the invitation is the same to this country as it is to the other countries. We all know, as stated by the distinguished Senator from Maine, that while there may be minute reference or attention paid to commercial matters, this conference is called for the settlement of questions on account of differences as to which France and Germany to-day have their hands ready to lay upon each other's throats.

Mr. President, there is a further fact that we learn from the European press, informed as it has been by its own governments. The very agreement upon which this conference is based specifies that the conference shall not have power to interfere with the commercial relations now settled by treaty as between Morocco and these other countries. So if such were the reason it is not a good reason.

There is no reason why the fact that the United States was a party to the Morocco treaty should require that it should be a party to this treaty, because the main thing in the Moroccan treaty, the treaty of 1880, it is stipulated shall not be interfered with by this conference.

Mr. President, in relation to the very interesting remarks of the distinguished Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE], I thoroughly agree with him, and not only so but I believe that nine out of ten men who have heard him to-day agree with him as to the principles which he has announced, and as to the policy which we should observe and of which we should be regardful. I do not expect to hear any Senator rise in his place to-day and take issue with him as to these principles and policies. There is but one point upon which I differ from the learned Senator. As I understand the position of the Senator, he very frankly says that he would have preferred if we had not been parties to this conference, and he gives the soundest and the best and most unanswerable reasons why his preference in that matter is well founded. But he says that in this particular case we have no particular reason to fear.

Well, Mr. President, I do not believe that any great injury is going to come to us out of this particular case, because I believe, as I hope, that it is going to be settled peaceably; but the question as to whether it is a prudent thing to do is not to be settled by the question of what is most likely to happen; it is to be considered in the light of what may possibly happen. I put to the Senator a question upon the result of this conference as to Germany, for instance, and I only speak of these countries because of the facts involved, and what I am saying does not relate in any manner to any relation between us and these countries, and consequently there is no indelicacy in speaking of it. If the result of this conference should be one which Germany would refuse to abide by, what would result? Where would stand the United States? Suppose, for instance, as is given out in the papers—and who will doubt it?—the European governments are looking to the United States as one power which is to exercise a great influence in determining what shall be the order and decree of that conference. It may be that there is a tie vote except the vote of the United States, which may be the one to decide upon the judgment and order of the conference. It may be that the deciding vote of the United States shall determine a policy to which Germany will object and on account of which she will go to war.

Mr. HALE. Now, I should hope——

Mr. BACON. I hope the Senator will pardon me and let me finish. I always listen to him with the greatest pleasure, but it is better that I should finish the proposition——

Mr. HALE. Very well.

Mr. BACON. Because there is another alternative that I wish to put, and I shall then be more than glad to hear the Senator, as he always enlightens every question which he touches.

Suppose that in the vote, as I was saying, it should turn out as the result that the determination was reached in consequence of the casting vote of the United States Government, and that on account of the decree and order of that conference Germany should refuse to abide by what it should thus determine and should go to war, where would stand the Government of the United States? I understand the Senator, and I hope he will reply afterwards, because I will be more than glad to have him do so.

Mr. President, when European nations get together in a conference for the purpose of settling a question on account of which war is threatened, there is an implied and moral obligation, in the first place, that they will abide by the judgment and decree of the conference; and there is an implied and a moral obligation, in the second place, that if any power refuses to abide by the decree of that conference those who thus agree to it will compel its obedience. They are not there for idle play. They are not there for the solution of abstract conundrums. They are there for the practical and, if need be, the forcible settlement of great questions upon which will depend the powers of the world and who shall exercise them.

When they agree to get together in the conference the country which consents to that conference and then refuses to abide by it is at war with all the others, and all the others are under a moral obligation to enforce it. To-day a large part of Europe, an important part of it, is regulated and controlled by the decree of the Berlin conference. If there should be on the part of any one of the signatory powers an infraction of that decree, every government a party to that decree is under a moral obligation to support every other power in the enforcement of that decree. The United States can not take part in that conference, it can not be one to decide by its vote what shall be the decree, and then refuse to assist in the enforcement of the decree.

Now, I have one more suggestion to make, if the Senator will pardon me. It will be very short, and he can answer them both together, because they are cognate. Suppose, as in the European press it is suggested, that possibly the American delegates will not vote, but that they will simply counsel and advise, and suppose, in consequence of that counsel and advice there is a result reached which otherwise would not be reached, because sometimes a man's counsel and advice is worth very much more than his vote, as is the case with the learned and honorable Senator from Maine. Yet the moral obligation upon the United States, which would thus be imposed by its action would be no less great than the moral obligation in case it had itself voted. In either case to shirk the responsibility of the result brought about by its own act would be a pusillanimity.

Now I will hear from the Senator, although I have not quite completed what I had to say in response to his valuable suggestions.

Mr. HALE. The point on which the Senator arrested my attention was the proposition that it might happen, not upon some matter touching commerce, not upon some matter affecting our trade, but upon some matter vitally affecting the peace of Europe, that there might be a drawn condition among them, and that the vote of the delegates from the United States would decide the result.

My mind, Mr. President, is as clear as crystal upon what should be done and what I believe would be done in such a grave emergency. Conferences to-day are not like the old-fashioned world conferences, where the world learns the result after weeks and weeks have passed, where battles are fought after treaties have been concluded, but every nation is in hourly and momentary touch with its representative in any great conference.

I should have no doubt that in such a condition, in such a grave emergency as the Senator has arrayed before us, the Secretary of State would telegraph the approval of the President that the United States delegation should decline absolutely participation in that vote.

Mr. BACON. But, if the Senator will pardon me, would it not be better that they should be kept away from there altogether?

Mr. HALE. They are there. I wish they were not, but they are there; and when it comes to a critical condition, if it ever does, I should have no doubt that Secretary Root, backed up by the President, would send a swift dispatch over the wires that in these conditions the American delegation is instructed not to vote, and, if need be, to emphasize its absolute declination to participate in the grave problems that are confronting the powers of Europe, to withdraw from the conference and return home.

Mr. BACON. Exactly.

Mr. HALE. But I do not agree with the Senator in his intimation that that would involve any pusillanimity on our part. That is, we do not go into the conference in the way European powers do. The reason that is given is a slight one—the commercial relations; and if the other things, which mean war, horrid war, between European powers, jealous of each other, confront that conference and our deciding vote shall settle it either way, I have no more doubt than I doubt that I stand here before the Senate, the Administration would withdraw our delegates absolutely, if necessary, and that Europe would go on and fight its own fights out and take the dread arbitrament of war, in which we have no part and ought to have no part. I would not be troubled in the least by the situation that the Senator has pictured.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. BACON. I hope the Senator will allow me to reply to the Senator from Maine.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I wish to ask only a question for information. How many European powers are requested to attend this conference? Senators have been talking about a deciding vote. I think there are seven.

Mr. BACON. So far as I can gather from the public press, France, Germany, Great Britain, Austria, Italy, Spain, and Russia.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Seven. So there can not be a tie vote of seven.

Mr. BACON. Oh, well.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. But the Senator talks about a deciding vote.

Mr. BACON. Possibly one of them might withdraw. We can not tell. But that is not material.

Mr. President, replying to the Senator from Maine, as I catch the meaning, the kernel of the Senator's suggestion, when reduced to its last analysis, it at last comes back to what the Senator has substantially stated, although with very much more point than my words, to wit, that we really have no business there. What the Senator has last said, when reduced to its last analysis, means that we have no business there, because, according to the suggestion of the Senator, if the time ever comes when what we are to do is to influence the action of that convention our delegates should be telegraphed to withdraw from it. As the Senator says, we have no business there; it is a mere matter of tinsel, so far as that goes, a mere parade, so that we may hereafter be classed with the great war powers, a mere sending of delegates to cooperate with delegates from European powers as a matter of pompous show and display, with the simple understanding that they are there merely as a matter of ornament and not to accomplish anything, not to attend to anything; but that if it reaches a point where their participation will determine the result they will be telegraphed to withdraw. If so, why are they there at all?

This construction of his last utterance is all consistent with what the Senator from Maine says. The Senator from Maine said in his previous remarks that he not only wishes that they were not there, but he has practically said that they have no business there; that we have nothing to accomplish there for the good of this Government, but that we have great dangers to incur to this Government on account of our participation.

Then he goes further to express his confidence in the President and Secretary of State, and says if it should turn out that our presence there would be a matter which would exercise an influence on the determination of these grave questions by the conference, his mind is clear as crystal that they would be instructed to withdraw from it.

But I want to follow still further the suggestion of the Senator in the first part of his interesting remarks as to whether or not he would agree with me in my present contention so far as regards the present instance. Mr. President, if we concede all that the Senator says, if we recognize the propriety and correctness of his want of concurrence in the propriety of mingling in such matters, is the question as to such propriety met by the suggestion that in the present case there is such confidence in the President and in the Secretary of State that no harm will come, that no harm will come in this instance because of the confidence of the Senator that we now have a good President and a wise President and a good and wise Secretary of State?

Conceding that no harm will come, and conceding the soundness of all the confidence which he expresses in these high and distinguished officers, does the Senator shut his eyes to the fact that we are establishing a precedent? If a good President and a wise President and a good Secretary of State and a wise Secretary of State and a patriotic President and a patriotic Secretary of State can send delegates to a European conference relative to European international controversies, can not an unwise President do it? Can not an unwise Secretary of State advise it? Can not a President not so good and not so patriotic and a Secretary of State not so good and so learned and so patriotic as the Senator believes these officers to be also do these things.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Maine?

Mr. BACON. Certainly.

Mr. HALE. I have already stated that such a condition might happen. There might be an Executive and an Administration that believed a policy which embroiled us in war would be to the advantage of the President or the Administration in precipitating a war. I have felt that we have a safe standing with the present President and Secretary of State, and that can not result.

And I do not believe that in such a condition the Senate and House of Representatives are robbed of all power and must wait until the mischief is done. The Senate is not an eleventh-hour body. It has not got to wait until the horse is stolen. There would be under such condition the right in Congress to arrest and prevent the great calamity which would fall upon the country from such an Administration.

Mr. BACON. I quite agree with the Senator in that opinion as to the powers and duties of the Senate.

Mr. NEWLANDS. May I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. BACON. If the Senator from Nevada will permit me to reply to the Senator from Maine first, I will then yield with pleasure.

I quite agree with the Senator from Maine in that regard, Mr. President, and I am only replying to so much of what he said as might be construed into a consent on his part to the propriety of such interference and such entanglement in a case where there happened to be a good President and a good Secretary of State. I said in the earlier part of my remarks that this rule is an absolute rule. It is not a rule with qualifications. It is not a rule with exceptions. It is a rule absolute and without exceptions that not only when we have a good President or when we have a good purpose are we to abstain from these entanglements, and not only when we fail to have them are we going to abstain from such entanglements, but also whether we have a good President or a bad President, or a good purpose or a bad purpose, we are to abstain, because the rule must apply equally in each case.

I was simply endeavoring to point out that while the Senator might be free from apprehensions on account of the particular facts in this case and the particular officials involved, still we are engaged in a matter which establishes a precedent, a precedent which may be followed in the future, and followed by one not good and not wise who may sit in the Executive chair, because it is altogether possible that there may be such a fate in store for this country. The time was when a man who was not a good man had in the electoral college a tie vote for the Presidency of the United States, a man who afterwards was tried for treason to the United States. Now, I will hear the Senator from Nevada.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President, on this very question of precedent I should like to ask the Senator from Georgia a question. I understand him to say that the question in this matter will be a question for the future, even though the action may be attended with no ill results. I wish to inquire whether there are any instances in the history of the country in which similar action has been taken by the Government. In this connection I would ask the Senator to differentiate between the action taken by the President in this case and the action taken by Mr. Hay at the time of the breaking out of the war between Russia and Japan when he addressed a letter to the great powers, including Russia and Japan, intended to secure the integrity of China and to confine the war entirely to Manchuria.

As I understand it, that was a political complication, not merely a commercial complication. I do not understand that the action was taken upon the ground that we had commercial interests there in jeopardy. It was just as much political action then as this action is to-day. How would the Senator differentiate between those two cases?

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, I may be very unfortunate in my view of the two cases, but it seems to me that they bear no similarity whatever. In the first place, there was no conference. There was no delegation of power to anybody.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Yes; if the Senator will permit me, there was an interference upon the part of the United States with a political complication existing upon the continent of Asia. How did the United States have anything more to do with that political complication than it can have with a political complication in Europe? If we have no business in the political complications of Europe, have we any business in the political complications of Asia? Let me say to the Senator that I am not taking any position hostile to that which he assumes. On the contrary, I am quite sympathetic with the view that he expresses. I simply wish to inquire whether we have not gone already a considerable degree in the line of this policy of interfering with matters that are no concern of ours?

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, it is possibly true that we have, but that would be no reason why we should go still further. It would be rather a warning to us why we should be on our guard not to proceed still further.

Now as to whether or not the Senator's suggestion is entirely accurate, that in the matter of the suggestion of Secretary Hay we violated this rule which has been laid down and observed by our Government for more than a century, it would take, of course, a good deal of time to analyze all that and to discuss the relation of it and the question as to whether it was such a policy.

But there is this great distinguishing difference between the two, that in the one case there was no conference of the powers, no delegation of authority of the powers of Europe and of America, but there was simply a note, if I recollect correctly, sent by Mr. Hay to each of the representatives of this Government at the courts of the leading powers intimating that there should be a suggestion to the two great powers then engaged in war that they would limit the theater of war to the country in which it legitimately belonged, and that there would not be an intrusion by the armies of those countries into the adjacent country and territory of China. The question as to whether or not that was entirely proper I can not now stop to discuss, and if it did infringe upon the well-established principle I would deprecate it to that extent.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I understand from the Senator that we were invited because we happened to be one of the signatory powers, of whom there were eight, seven of whom were European and the eighth ourselves. Does not the Senator think that it would have been extremely discourteous, being one of the signatory powers, if Morocco had asked all the others and had not asked us, when its action might modify the treaty or arrangement to which we were signatories?

Mr. BACON. Well, Mr. President, I will respond to the learned Senator that according to my understanding and according to the statements which I have seen in the published dispatches from Europe, this conference is based upon an agreement in which it is expressly stipulated that the commercial arrangements which are now secured by treaty shall not be called in question, and therefore I do not see that it would have been a matter of discourtesy on the part of Morocco to have failed to invite us to that conference.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. At all events the Senator will admit it was proper, since Morocco was inviting those powers who were signatory, to invite us?

Mr. BACON. No; I do not think so.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. And if we had not been invited it would be a matter of which we might make complaint, providing we wanted to make any complaint, all the other signatory powers having been invited. Now, if it was proper to invite us, it is certainly not improper to respond when all our sister signatory powers go there.

Mr. BACON. In the first place, I do not think it was at all important to invite us, or that we should have been slighted if we had not been invited, in view of our well-known policy of noninterference in European political questions, and of the fact that the powers which called this conference expressly stipulated that commercial matters shall not be interfered with, and that the conference shall have no power to discuss them or make any order or decree about them. In the second place, I do not think it would be discourteous on the part of this Government whenever it receives an invitation of that kind to reply that, there being questions of this grave character of European international politics, it is contrary to the traditional and well-recognized and thoroughly settled and defined policy of this Government to participate in such controversies, and, therefore, with utmost thanks and courtesy, to decline.

Now, Mr. President, if it were true that there were important commercial interests, or even vital commercial interests, whether large or small, involved which might be considered, it would certainly be perfectly practical for this Government to reply, "This is a question in which the commercial question is insignificant compared with the political questions involved; it is to have little or no attention. The great question which is to concern you is one on account of which one government is ordering 20,000 cars to transport troops, and another government is concentrating troops on the border, and, on account of which, each of these governments is concentrating its fleets at Gibraltar, and on account of which the European press is teeming with apprehension as to war. It is a matter that we are not to be connected with, and therefore we respectfully decline. When you get through, if you have commercial matters to consider we will be glad to join with you in the consideration of them." But there is no room for that in this case, for, as I have said a dozen times, the commercial matters are expressly excepted from the jurisdiction of this conference.

Mr. President, I have detained the Senate very much longer than I intended, and very much longer than I would have done had it not been, I think, for the very proper and pertinent and interesting interruptions of Senators, and I shall not longer do so.

Now, Mr. President, I want to say one word in conclusion in order that I may not be misunderstood. There have at times been suggestions that this is an assault on the President. I have been influenced in this matter by no partisanship. I believe I am capable of supporting a principle for reasons higher than partisan reasons. If this were the act of a Democratic President I would be all the more earnest and emphatic in my dissent from its propriety. There is no basis for the suggestion that anything I have said or done can be construed as an assault on the President, or that any word I have uttered can be considered as personally or officially disrespectful to him. I have made it my rule in the Senate never to speak disrespectfully of the President of the United States. I have been in the Senate under three different Presidents, and it has always happened that with no one of the three have I been in entire accord on all matters. It has fallen to me to differ with each of them on particular matters and to express those differences plainly and earnestly in debate in the Senate, but I can challenge the record that no word has ever fallen from my lips in the Senate in disrespect to either President, whether he be Republican or Democrat, and so long as I can guard my utterances none ever shall.

Nor, sir, do I desire in any manner to reflect upon the President or to depreciate his services. For instance, coming back to this matter of international conferences, I recognize that he performed a great public service, a great service for humanity, one on account of which his name will go down to posterity in great honor, in bringing about peace between Japan and Russia. I think that he not only honored himself, but all the American people, when he did so, and I do not think that in so doing he in any manner contravened this great principle. It is always in order for the United States Government to interpose its good offices to stop the shedding of blood.

But, Mr. President, the corollary of that is not true. It is not in order for the Government of the United States to interpose in a conference called in Europe for the purpose of avoiding war, for if it is, then the doctrine is gone, and there is none of it left, because every conference of that kind that is called in Europe is called for the purpose of preventing war. I also recognize the character and ability of the Secretary of State. I know him to be a man of great ability, entitled to esteem and respect. He is a man with whom my personal relations are entirely pleasant and against whom I would not say a word that is disrespectful.

I believe the President of the United States is a patriotic man, but I believe he is also a strong-willed and an impulsive man, and I think it is the duty of the Senate of the United States, as well as of the House, but more particularly of the Senate, to endeavor in a respectful way to guard the institutions of this country and the policies of this country, not in antagonism, but in harmony with the President of the United States, whether he belongs to one party or the other party.

I have no reason, Mr. President, to have any other feeling toward the President of the United States than that which I have expressed. While he is a man of a different political party from myself, while he is a native of a different State, a part of his ancestry is from my own State, and not only from my own State, but from the immediate little community in which I myself was reared; and, in the cemetery of historic Midway there sleep some of his ancestors by the side of those who gave me life and being. I would say no word which would be disrespectful to him. But when I differ from him upon a grave public question, one in my opinion of vital importance to the safety of this country, I violate no propriety, on the contrary, I perform a public duty, in giving utterance to the reasons for my difference.

The President of the United States is not a lawyer, and according to him the utmost good faith, one who is not a lawyer will sometimes do things which are not in accordance with what would be done by one versed in the law. For instance, Senators who hear me know the fact that there is now included and published among the treaties of the United States an agreement made with Cuba as to the extradition of criminals from the part of the country leased to us for naval stations which has never been submitted to the Senate, but which has been marked "approved" by the President of the United States and put in the files, and it is to-day printed in the volume entitled "Treaties in Force." Of course it is utterly without force and effect, because it has never been ratified by the Senate or submitted to this body for ratification.

I do not believe that the President of the United States did that advisedly. Who would believe it? But I give that simply as an illustration of the fact that in this great Government, with its vast interests, with its tremendous labors, with its multiplied duties of all kinds, one not a lawyer, one necessarily with his attention divided with myriads of uncounted things, will sometimes do things which otherwise he would not have done, and which more particularly one trained in the law would not have done.

Now, I do not believe that any harm is going to come to us out of this Algeciras conference except in the matter of precedent. I think it very possible if this matter had not been brought to the attention of the country, if it had not been discussed in the Senate, if it had not been most intelligently and widely discussed, as it has been, by the press from one end of this country to the other, possibly there might have been done there things which would not have been to our interest, and which would have contravened our vital policy of nonintervention in European political disputes. But I believe the effect of this discussion in the Senate, and I believe the effect of the very elaborate and able discusion which it has had in the public press, have awakened the whole country to the danger and will safeguard our interests there.

The great evil is the precedent, and to avoid that evil, Mr. President, it should be known in no uncertain words that it is not hereafter to be considered as a precedent, and that when the nations of Europe gather together in conference for the purpose of settling great international questions involving peace and war and involving questions of domination of this foreign country, or that, or the other, or of the balance of power, the United States Government will severely let it alone and confine itself to the consideration of its own affairs.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair will ask the Senator from Georgia what disposition he wishes to have made of his resolution?

Mr. BACON. I will ask that it be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations, unless some other Senator desires to speak on it.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. In the absence of objection, it is so referred.

PONCE RAILWAY AND LIGHT COMPANY OF PORTO RICO.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the following message from the President of the United States; which was read, and, with the accompanying paper, referred to the Committee on Pacific Islands and Porto Rico.

The Senate and House of Representatives:

Referring to section 32 of the act approved April 12, 1900, entitled "An act temporarily to provide revenues and a civil government for Porto Rico, and for other purposes," I transmit herewith an ordinance enacted by the executive council of Porto Rico granting to the Ponce Railway and Light Company, its successors and assigns, the right to pass its cars over a certain piece of track on Real street, Ponce Playa, Porto Rico, owned and operated by the American Railroad Company of Porto Rico.

This ordinance has been approved by the President.

Attention is invited to the accompanying report of the Secretary of State.

THEODORE ROOSEVELT.

THE WHITE HOUSE, January 15, 1906.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

The joint resolution (H. J. Res. 68) relating to the contingent expenses of the House of Representatives was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

COLUMBIA RIVER BRIDGE.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 2558) authorizing W. T. Clark to construct a bridge across the Columbia River near the city of Wenatchee, Wash., which was, on page 3, line 23, to strike out the words "two years" and insert "one year."

Mr. ANKENY. I move that the Senate concur in the amendment of the House of Representatives.

The motion was agreed to.

THE MERCHANT MARINE.

Mr. GALLINGER. I ask that the unfinished business may now be laid before the Senate.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 529) to promote the national defense, to create a force of naval volunteers, to establish American ocean-mail lines to foreign markets, to promote commerce, and to provide revenue from tonnage.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, it will be remembered that during the Fifty-eighth Congress there was before the Senate a bill, sent here, I think, by the Navy Department, for the creation of a so-called "naval reserve." The Navy Department thinks it is a very important matter, as does the Committee on Commerce of this body. The first section of the bill now under consideration provides for a force of naval volunteers, traversing substantially the same ground the Navy Department did in the bill we formerly had under consideration.

Upon consultation with the Navy Department the General Board of that Department drafted a provision which they desire shall be inserted in lieu of section 1 of the pending bill. It does not materially change the bill; it changes the phraseology somewhat, and there are more naval terms in it than there were in our bill. We are assured, if this provision shall go in the bill, we will not be troubled with a bill from the Department in reference to this matter.

I brought the matter to the attention of the Committee on Commerce at its last meeting and I was instructed by that committee to offer it as an amendment to the bill, which I now do.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment proposed by the Senator from New Hampshire will be read.

The SECRETARY. Strike out section 1 of the bill and insert:

That there shall be enrolled in such manner and under such requirements as the Secretary of the Navy may prescribe, from the officers and men now and hereafter employed in the merchant marine and deep-sea fisheries of the United States, such officers, petty officers, and men as may be capable of rendering service as members of a naval reserve, for duty in time of war, and who are willing to undertake such service, to be classified in grades and ratings according to their capacity as shown at time of enrollment. No man shall be thus enrolled who is not a citizens of the United States, either by birth or naturalization. These members of the Naval Reserve shall be enrolled for a period of four years, during which period they shall be subject to render service on call of the President in time of war. They shall also possess such qualifications, receive such instruction, and be subject to such regulations as the Secretary of the Navy may prescribe. The Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized and directed, upon proper audit, to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to each officer, petty officer, or man thus enrolled and employed in the merchant marine or deep-sea fisheries, as hereinafter provided, an annual retainer, as follows: For each officer of the line or Engineer Corps having the rank of lieutenant of the Naval Reserve, $110; for each officer of the line or Engineer Corps having the rank of lieutenant (junior grade) in the Naval Reserve, $90; for each officer of the line or Engineer Corps having the rank of ensign in the Naval Reserve, $80; for each man with a rating of chief petty officer, $70; for each man with a rating of petty officer, first class, $60; for each man with a rating of petty officer, second class, $48; for each man with a rating of petty officer, third class, $40; for each seaman, first class, $36; for each seaman, second class, $30; for each seaman, third class, $24. Such retainer shall be paid at the end of each year of service on certificate by an officer, to be designated by the Secretary of the Navy, that the member of the Naval Reserve has satisfactorily complied with the regulations, and on certificate by the Commissioner of Navigation that such member has served satisfactorily for at least six months of the preceding twelve months on vessels of the United States in the merchant marine or in the deep-sea fisheries. Each officer, petty officer, or man of the Naval Reserve thus enrolled who has not served for six months of the preceding year on vessels of the United States in the merchant marine or in the deep-sea fisheries, but has complied with the other prescribed requirements for enrollment in the Naval Reserve, shall receive one-half the annual retainer as enumerated above.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Without objection, the amendment will be agreed to.

Mr. CLAY. I wish to call the attention of the Senator from New Hampshire to the fact that the senior Senator from Florida [Mr. MALLORY] intended to address the Senate to-day on the bill. I do not think he is opposed to this amendment, but I understood him to say that he expected to address the Senate to-day on the general features of the bill after this amendment was presented to the Senate. I should be glad if the Senator would allow the amendment to go over until the Senator from Florida reaches the Senate. I do not know why he is not here.

Mr. GALLINGER. I can assure the Senator from Georgia that the Senator from New Hampshire has no desire to take advantage of the absence of the Senator from Florida.

Mr. CLAY. I am sure of that.

Mr. GALLINGER. I will say to the Senator from Georgia that this amendment was submitted to the Senator from Florida. He examined it very critically and made some changes in it, which we agreed to, and it is entirely agreeable to that Senator.

Mr. CLAY. I think the Senator from New Hampshire is correct in that statement, but I also think he will find the Senator from Florida desires to address the Senate on the general features of the bill, and he expects to point out that the bill will be improved by the adoption of this amendment. I understood the Senator from Florida to say that he would desire to address the Senate when this amendment was presented.

Mr. GALLINGER. All the Senator from Florida, then, will have to do will be to call attention to the fact that the bill has been improved upon his suggestion by the adoption of this amendment. The only one change, I will say to the Senator, that is material in this amendment is that in the bill it was provided that the naval volunteers or naval reserves should be citizens of the United States, or men who had declared their intention to become citizens. The Senator from Florida made serious objection to that provision, and it has been eliminated in this amendment. The Senator from Florida, in the minority report, criticises that feature of the bill.

Mr. CLAY. Yes; I think that is true.

Mr. GALLINGER. That is true. I think I can safely say to the Senator from Georgia that the Senator from Florida will not object to the adoption of this amendment. My purpose is to get the bill reprinted with the amendments. Of course it will go over if the Senator from Georgia wishes it.

Mr. CLAY. With that understanding I will withdraw any further objection.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Without objection, the amendment is agreed to.

Mr. GALLINGER. I am instructed by the Committee on Commerce to offer a few other verbal amendments. I move, in section 2, page 4, line 5, after the word "or," where it occurs the second time, to insert the words "not to exceed two months;" on the same page, line 11, after the word "or," where it occurs the second time, to insert "not to exceed one month;" and on the same page, line 18, after the word "or," to insert "not to exceed one month;" so as to read:

SEC. 2. That in the interest of the national defense and for the performance of the public services hereinafter specified, after July 1, 1907, the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized and directed to pay, subject to the provisions of this act, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to the owner or owners of any vessel hereafter built and registered in the United States or now duly registered by a citizen or citizens of the United States (including as such citizens any corporation created under the laws of the United States or any of the States thereof), subventions as hereinafter provided; that is to say, (a) the sum of $5 per gross registered ton for each vessel which has been engaged in the foreign trade by sea or the deep-sea fisheries for a period of twelve months, including time necessarily consumed in receiving or discharging cargo, or not to exceed two months in making annual or extraordinary repairs; (b) the sum of $4 per gross registered ton for each vessel which, during any twelve consecutive months, has been engaged in the foreign trade by sea or the deep-sea fisheries for a period of nine months or over, but less than twelve months, including time necessarily consumed in receiving or discharging cargo, or not to exceed one month in making extraordinary repairs; (c) the sum of $2.50 per gross registered ton for each vessel which, during any twelve consecutive months, has been engaged in the foreign trade by sea or the deep-sea fisheries for a period of six months or over, but less than nine months, including time necessarily consumed in receiving or discharging cargo, or not to exceed one month in making extraordinary repairs.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. GALLINGER. In section 3, page 7, line 7, at the end of the line, I move to strike out the word "desired" and insert the word "needed;" so as to read:

Fifth. That all ordinary repair or overhauling of said vessel shall be made in the United States, except in cases where dry docking is necessary and no dry dock of sufficient capacity shall be within a distance of 500 miles of the location of the ship when the repairs shall be needed.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. GALLINGER. In section 3, page 7, line 12, after the word "naval," I move to strike out the word "volunteers" and insert the word "reserve;" and on the same page, line 16, after the word "naval," to strike out the word "volunteers" and insert the word "reserves;" so as to read:

Sixth. A vessel shall not be entitled to the subvention above provided for unless during the period of employment in the foreign trade or deep-sea fisheries the following proportions of the crew of the vessel after the dates specified shall have been enrolled in the naval reserve: After July 1, 1908, one-eighth; after July 1, 1912, one-sixth; after July 1, 1917, one-fourth: Provided, That if the foregoing stated proportions of naval reserves can not be obtained at a foreign port with reasonable effort, as certified by the consul, other persons may be substituted until the first return of said vessel to the United States, without forfeiture of the subvention.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. GALLINGER. In section 7, page 13, line 15, after the word "enrolled," I move to insert the words "in the;" in the same line, after the word "naval," to strike out "volunteers" and insert "reserve;" and in line 19, after the word "naval," to strike out "volunteers" and insert "reserves;" so as to make the section read:

SEC. 7. That all contracts hereafter made pursuant to the act of March 3, 1891, before mentioned, or pursuant to sections 5 and 6 of this act, shall provide that on each voyage the following proportion of the crew shall be enrolled in the naval reserve: After July 1, 1908, one-eighth; after July 1, 1912, one-sixth, and after July 1, 1917, one-fourth: Provided, That if the foregoing stated proportions of naval reserves can not be obtained at a foreign port with reasonable effort, as certified by the consul, other persons may be substituted until the first return of said vessel to the United States, without forfeiture of the compensation.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. GALLINGER. In section 9, page 15, line 1, after the word "enrolled," I move to insert the words "as seaman, third class;" and in the same line, after the word "naval," to strike out "volunteers" and insert "reserve;" so as to make the section read:

SEC. 9. That on proof to the satisfaction of the Commissioner of Navigation that a vessel of the United States has on any foreign voyage carried a boy or boys, a citizen or citizens of the United States, under 21 years of age, suitably trained during that voyage in seamanship or engineering, in the proportion of one for such vessel, and in addition one for each 1,000 tons of her net registered tonnage, there shall be paid to the owner or owners of the vessel, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, an allowance equivalent to 80 per cent of the tonnage duties paid in respect of the entry in the United States of that vessel from that voyage: Provided, That such payment shall not be made after July 1, 1908, except in respect of any boy who is enrolled as seaman, third class, in the naval reserve, or is an apprentice indentured in accordance with law.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. GALLINGER. I move to amend the title of the bill by striking out the words "force of," before the word "naval," and after the word "naval" by striking out the word "volunteers" and inserting the word "reserve;" so that the title will read: "A bill to promote the national defense, to create a naval reserve, to establish American ocean mail lines to foreign markets, to promote commerce, and to provide revenue from tonnage."

The amendment to the title was agreed to.

Mr. GALLINGER. Now, I ask that the bill may be reprinted showing the amendments adopted, such amendments to be printed in italics.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Without objection, the bill will be reprinted showing the amendments in italics, as requested by the Senator from New Hampshire.

Mr. GALLINGER. I do not know that any Senator is prepared to go on now with the discussion of the bill. The Senator from West Virginia [Mr. SCOTT] had intended to speak briefly, but he is not present, and I will yield for a motion to go into executive session.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. KEAN. If the Senator yields, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After nineteen minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at 4 o'clock and 2 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Tuesday, January 16, 1906, at 12 o'clock meridian.

NOMINATIONS.

Executive nominations received by the Senate January 15, 1906.

CHIEF JUSTICE OF SUPREME COURT.

John H. Burford, of Oklahoma, to be chief justice of the supreme court of the Territory of Oklahoma. A reappointment, his term expiring February 15, 1906.

ASSOCIATE JUSTICES OF SUPREME COURT.

MONDAY, January 15, 1906.

The House met at 11 o'clock a. m.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. HENRY N. COUDEN, D. D.

The Journal of Saturday's proceedings was read and approved.

PERSONAL PRIVILEGE.

Mr. BABCOCK. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of personal privilege.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BABCOCK. I send a clipping to the Clerk's desk and ask that it be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

HOW CAME BABCOCK TO REBEL.

A story was circulated yesterday, apparently from the stalwart faction in the House, to show how Mr. BABCOCK happened to become an insurgent. According to this story, Mr. BABCOCK has assumed the leadership of the rebel forces because he is disgruntled over having been turned down when he applied for the chairmanship of the Committee on Appropriations. It is stated that when Mr. HEMENWAY, who was chairman of the committee in the Fifty-eighth Congress, was elected to the Senate Mr. BABCOCK presented to the Speaker his claims for recognition by an assignment to the head of this important committee.

He represented that for ten years he had been chairman of the Republican Congressional committee, and that under his leadership large Republican majorities had been invariably returned to the House; that he had conducted these campaigns at no small amount of personal sacrifice, so much so, in fact, that at the last election he came near losing his seat in the House. Furthermore, that he had always been in line with the party organization, and had even surrendered his views on the question of tariff revision to party expediency, and that therefore his services should be recognized. Instead of getting the coveted place, he was turned down and Representative TAWNEY, of Minnesota, one of the chief among insurgents, was selected for the place. This action on the part of the Speaker, it was said, has caused Mr. BABCOCK to join the ranks of the insurgents, he having seen that rebels are rewarded and faithful services disregarded.

POSITION ON HAMILTON MEASURE.

It was also pointed out by the stalwarts in this connection that Mr. BABCOCK, in the last Congress, supported the same principle involved in the statehood bill which is embodied in the Hamilton measure.

There has been much discussion of Mr. BABCOCK's determined attitude as an insurgent in the present Congress, and this reason is assigned by the stalwarts for the position he has taken.

Mr. BABCOCK. Now, Mr. Speaker——

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, I have no objection, of course, to the gentleman making his statement; but I do not want this to go as a precedent in the matter of personal privilege. I do not think there is any, but I will not raise any question of that kind, as I do not desire to interfere with the gentleman's statement.

Mr. BABCOCK. Now, Mr. Speaker, if I am not entitled to consideration as a matter of personal privilege, I do not want the floor. When a Member is totally misrepresented in his attitude toward official matters before the House, if that is not personal privilege, I do not know what is.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will say to the gentleman that as there is no objection the Chair is not called upon to rule as to whether it presents a matter of personal privilege or not, and the gentleman will proceed.

Mr. BABCOCK. Mr. Speaker, I desire to say that this statement totally misrepresents me and misrepresents my position, as I believe it does the so-called "stalwarts," which evidently refers to the House organization. In the first place, Mr. Speaker, I have never been an applicant for the position of chairman of the Committee on Appropriations. I have never made a suggestion and never have applied for the place. I did not want it, Mr. Speaker, and had it been tendered to me I should have respectfully declined it, as I do not feel that under the circumstances and conditions of my health that I could fill it to the satisfaction of the House. Now, this article, Mr. Speaker, claims that on account of my disappointment it brought about my opposition to certain legislation. Mr. Speaker, ever since I have been a Member of this body I have been a consistent and earnest opponent of either single or joint statehood for Arizona and New Mexico. During the last session of Congress I declined to vote for the proposition. But I did support the Committee on Rules in the various propositions which were brought before the House. The proposition of joint statehood was brought about, not for the purpose of creating a single State out of the two Territories, but as the lesser of two evils and for the purpose of defeating the whole proposition. This is well known to every Member of the House who had anything to do with that legislation. Mr. Speaker, I do not want to take the time of the House except to refer to one other matter in the statement which has been read by the Clerk, and that is "that Mr. BABCOCK had even surrendered his views on the question of tariff revision to party expediency." Well, Mr. Speaker, that may be intended as a compliment. I have always been an organization man. I have endeavored to act with the organization and with the party, but I want to say here now that I hold the same opinion on the question of tariff revision that I did three years ago; I never have experienced any change, but I have simply bowed to the will of the majority, and to explain my position, Mr. Speaker, I send this short resolution to be read by the Clerk, which expresses the position of the Wisconsin delegation, and with which I am in entire harmony.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Republican Members of the Wisconsin delegation in the House of Representatives favor an early revision of those schedules in the Dingley Act which are higher than is necessary to afford adequate protection.

January 14, 1905.

Mr. BABCOCK. That is the position, Mr. Speaker, that has been occupied by the Wisconsin delegation. There has been no division, and in a modest way I have given it my hearty support. I thank the gentlemen of the House for their kindness. [Applause.]

INFORMATION FROM SECRETARY OF THE NAVY.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 3—the Philippine tariff bill.

Mr. FOSS. Will the gentleman yield a moment?

Mr. PAYNE. I yield for a moment.

Mr. FOSS. Mr. Speaker, I desire to submit two privileged reports on House joint resolutions calling for information from the Secretary of the Navy. I call for the reading of the resolutions and the reading of the reports.

The Clerk read as follows:

House resolution 132.

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Navy be requested, if not incompatible with the public interests, to inform the House of Representatives whether since February 1, 1905, there has been any delay in the delivery of materials and armor for use in the construction of the United States ship Connecticut, building at the navy-yard at Brooklyn, N. Y., and what action, if any, has been taken by the Navy Department to obviate any such delay in the delivery of such materials and armor.

The Clerk read the report, as follows:

The Committee on Naval Affairs, to whom was referred House resolution No. 132, after careful consideration of the same, report it back and recommend its passage with the following amendments:

In lines 3 and 4 strike out the words "since February 1, 1905."

In line 6 strike out the word "ship" and insert in lieu thereof the word "ships;" and after the word "Connecticut" insert the words "and Louisiana."

In lines 6 and 7 strike out the words "building at the navy-yard at Brooklyn, N. Y."

Mr. FOSS. Mr. Speaker, I move the adoption of the resolution as amended.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution as amended.

The question was taken, and the amendments were agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution as amended.

The question was taken, and the resolution as amended was agreed to.

U. S. STEAMSHIPS CONNECTICUT AND LOUISIANA.

Mr. FOSS. Mr. Speaker, I call for the reading of House resolution No. 133.

The Clerk read the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Navy be requested, if not incompatible with the public interests, to inform the House of Representatives whether there have been any changes, modifications, or alterations in the plans and specifications for the U. S. S. Louisiana since the awarding of the contract for its construction; what changes, modifications, or alterations, if any, have been made, and the estimated cost thereof in addition to the contract price of said Louisiana.

Also the following amendments:

In line 5 strike out the word "ship" and in lieu thereof insert the word "ships," and insert thereafter "Connecticut and."

In lines 5, 6, and 7 strike out the words "since the awarding of the contract for its construction, what changes, modifications, or alterations, if any, have been made."

In line 7, after the word "cost," insert the words "if any."

In line 8, after the word "thereof," strike out the words "in addition to the contract price of said Louisiana" and insert in lieu thereof the words "for each ship."

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendments.

The question was taken, and the amendments were agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution as amended.

The question was taken, and the resolution as amended was agreed to.

THE PHILIPPINE TARIFF.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, I renew my motion that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 3—the Philippine tariff bill.

The motion was agreed to; and accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 3—the Philippine tariff bill—Mr. OLMSTED in the chair.

Mr. PARKER. Mr. Chairman, I speak for the principle of this bill—though I think it could be bettered in some respects by amendment—because it is for the welfare of the Philippine Islands and because the welfare of those islands is our welfare. Their prosperity means not only openings to our trade, but far more; it means happiness and contentment and peace and loyalty. One war, yes, not merely war, but brigandage, bankruptcy, trouble in raising Government funds, and deficiency in revenues, means more cost to us than all we could lose by every favor that we could show. It is not merely as our duty but as our interest that we seek their welfare. East Indian rebellions have cost England far more than she has gained from her narrow lords of trade policy of destroying their manufactures by her shop-made goods. The Boer war has cost her far more than she has gained by her aggressive commercial policy in the Rand. She lost the American colonies by interference here. On the other hand, she has bound to her Canada and Australia in a loyalty that is almost more than English by giving them the right to manage their own affairs, to settle their own business policy, to tax even her products for the protection of their manufactures, and to possess a substantial business independence with their own revenues and a prosperity of their own. May it be granted that we profit by that experience as to what we have to do.

The Philippines are not prosperous. It is not wholly our fault. When they came to us as sheep without a shepherd it was not our fault that the wolf-like ambitions of the dictator Aguinaldo brought war upon those islands. It was not our fault that business became impossible because of brigandage. It was not our fault that the plague struck the people or that the cattle plague destroyed all their farm animals and so ruined their agriculture. But it was our fault that when we had taken them away from Spain and from their market for their products there we gave them no other market. Those products, except hemp, are chiefly sugar and tobacco, and it is peculiar to sugar and tobacco that, unlike rice, wheat, or even lumber, they are under high tariffs by the laws of every country in the world. England taxes them for revenue, because she does not produce them. Germany taxes sugar for protection. Many countries tax tobacco as a government monopoly. It is idle to talk of the Philippines having the markets of the world in the face of tariffs which have broken down the sugar and tobacco production of the Tropics everywhere. The islands had a market in Spain. It was taken from them by the war that followed the destruction of the Maine. It was our duty as her trustee to give her a market at least as good, and we failed so to do. When our relations with the Philippines were adjusted in 1902 it was proposed that she should pay, as Porto Rico had done, only 25 per cent of the Dingley tariff, which tariff should be thrown around those islands; but Congress raised the percentage to 75 per cent of the Dingley tariff, which was practically prohibitory.

Their sugar and tobacco do not come here, but go to China, to the East Indies, and to Japan. Some little tobacco goes to Spain, where they know and like it. As a whole the insular exports have fallen off, and they are therefore not able to import. Customs receipts in two years have fallen a million dollars a year, or, in all, 4,000,000 pesos. Revenue has diminished just when more revenue is needed to open neglected roads, to restore order, to improve harbors, to introduce schools and sustain education, to introduce new productions and trades, and to open the minds of the people to the civilization of the modern world. There seems to be a deficit in the last two years, and revenues have not equaled expenditures. The attempt to give them a preference in our market by only 25 per cent rebate on the tariff absolutely failed. Out of their customs of some eight millions of dollars, only $549,161.81—say, half a million dollars—comes from the return duties of the United States. Duties on hemp going to the United States have to be returned to the exporter.

Under these circumstances the Philippine government was confronted with a deficit, and to meet it they were forced to reestablish the Spanish system of taxation by an internal-revenue law in 1904 which is as strong as our revenue law in the worst part of the civil war.

Probably their peso, or 50-cent dollar, is as much to them as our whole dollar to us.

Distillers, rectifiers, wholesale liquor dealers, and brewers pay 200 pesos annually; retail liquor dealers, 48. A liter, or quart, of spirits pays 20 centavos, and beer 4 centavos, or Philippine cents; cigars pay a tax of over 10 per cent of their selling price; cigarettes, 1 and 2 pesos a thousand, and matches, 40 cents a gross. Banks pay half of 1 per cent on their capital stock, 1 per cent on their circulation, and two-thirds of 1 per cent on their deposits, paying monthly one-twelfth of these sums. There are stamp taxes on certificates of stock and bills of exchange, on insurance policies of life and fire, and on other written instruments of every kind, and then there is a tax on every occupation—doctors, lawyers, and all other employments pay a heavy tax.

Then we come to a singular arrangement. The cedula is a compulsory registration certificate. Every man must register annually and pay his poll tax, or else he can not go into court or be sworn as a witness or be examined or go before a notary. Nearly one and a half millions is collected by this register. It costs 1 peso in the first three months, and 2 pesos after April. Its payment is enforced by fines and by ten days' imprisonment if the man's property is not sufficient to pay the tax.

Merchants and manufacturers pay to the government a tax of one-third of 1 per cent on the gross value of all goods sold, and tax collectors inquire into that value. Common carriers, except cartmen who receive less than two thousand a year, pay 1 per cent of their receipts; brokers, 80 pesos; pawnbrokers, 200. Then there is a tax upon every trade or profession. The lawyer, doctor, surveyor, engineer, or auctioneer pays annually 50 pesos; dentist, chiropodist, manicurist, photographer, lithographer, engraver, or appraiser of tobacco or other product pays 40, and every veterinarian, farrier, repairer of bicycles and wagons, 20 pesos. Then there are taxes on lumber, perhaps more justifiable than some others. The government is expected to maintain most of the provincial and the municipal governments. They get the tax on amusements and half of the poll tax, but the government gives 10 per cent of all the other taxes to the provincial governments and 15 per cent to the municipal governments, according to population.

I append schedules embodying an abstract of these taxes and of the revenues of the fiscal year 1905 from customs and internal revenue.

The Philippine Commission assure us that this revenue law has become necessary in the Philippines. What a text this is! Necessary! It could only be necessary because there are no other sources of revenue, because exports and imports have been insufficient therefor, because this great country has not given them a market for their products, and because agriculture has become so unproductive that we dare not tax either their lands or their stock. This law tells us that in refusing them a market we have taken away the ordinary sources of revenue and have had to adopt permanently a system of taxation which is abhorrent to the American people and which cost England her colonies; a system which inquires into the particulars of every man's sales and manufactures, which supports an army of taxgatherers, which clogs enterprise, and which irritates the whole community.

I have here and append a statement from the Bureau of Insular Affairs showing the burden of these taxes. We wronged the islands when we gave them no market and refused them fair and reasonable access to our markets, which, if they had it, would give them revenue as well as prosperity. This wrong is endeavored to be corrected by this bill. It will help both prosperity and revenue. It will give them a market for their sugar, which will have a preference in our market over all other foreign sugar. Their imports are but a drop in the bucket and will not affect prices; but those prices will go to them. The bill, I think, will do something for their tobacco. It asks them not only to pay one-quarter of the Dingley rates, but also to pay the whole of our internal-revenue taxes, and this makes a total somewhat less than the total Dingley tariff on tobacco. But, on the other hand, the bill asks that all Americans and English who prefer American tobacco and cigars shall be allowed to have them in the Philippines free, except for the Philippine internal-revenue tax, and without any duty at all. It seems that what is fair for one might have been made fair for the other, but I do not know enough about this business to go into details.

I support this bill. It is a step in the right direction. I do not support it, however, in allowing all other products of the Philippines to come in free, for I think it would be better to have 25 per cent of the Dingley duty put upon those goods, whether cloths, in which they make wonderful fabrics, or lumber, or whatever it may be. That money could be sent back to them, for they needed revenue, and taxes, whether on exports or imports, are far less oppressive than the odious taxes upon production which now take their place. Perhaps it would be better to allow them to tax exports up to 25 per cent of the Dingley rate, but that taxation is forbidden by that bill. The bill should do more than it does for us. I think it should give us a preference on our exports to the Philippines, so as to induce Americans to go there and take their goods there. I do not think that the Spanish treaty prevents our giving such preferential tariff when article four provides that the ships and merchandise of Spain shall be admitted to the ports of the Philippines upon the same terms (the Spanish word is "conditions") as the ships and merchandise of the United States.

Mr. Chairman, there is a great deal to be said in favor of the view that this provision only means that Spain shall be admitted to do business in the Philippine ports and that it has nothing to do with the tariff; but even if it does compel an equality of tariff rates we need not fear the rivalry of Spain. We could safely enact a law that all merchandise wholly the product of the United States and wholly the product of Spain should be admitted into the Philippines at a reduced rate of half or a quarter of the tariff rate to others. We could say it without endangering ourselves. We certainly could say it as to certain special products like steel rails, cotton goods, and machinery of all kinds. We could give the business which now goes to foreign countries almost altogether to the United States, and thus enter upon the great work of binding together these islands and ourselves in real sentiments of loyalty and fellowship because of our mutual interests.

Even if some trade went to Spain it would be well repaid if we thereby obtained the friendship of the Spanish merchants, who still form so large a part of the Philippine business world. Such a provision would improve the bill. Probably it would be still better if we did not attempt to legislate for the future. The bill provides that after 1909 we will have free trade, and the report says "that if the revenues are otherwise sufficient there will no longer exist any reason for a duty on imports either way," and we may have free trade. How are they to be made sufficient? I hope the tariff revenue from other countries will grow. But if free trade be established between us and the Philippines at that time there will be really no tariff revenues of any sort if we can supply their wants. Then where are revenues to come from? If there be not enough, they must continue this odious business of taxation upon production, the destruction of production for the sake of revenue.

It is dangerous to found legislation on an "if" and a possibility that those revenues will then be sufficiently increased. If they are to be derived from a tariff, that tariff must be maintained to such an extent at least as is requisite for revenue. It can not be possible that anyone who cares for these people can contemplate maintaining the internal-revenue act already referred to for any length of time.

Legislation is only safe as it is based on present facts. This tariff is now essential to Philippine revenue. I will go further, and say that while any Philippine tariff should prefer the United States, that tariff should be maintained against the United States not only for the revenue of those islands, but to protect their industries. We want to build them up—to build up their spinning and dyeing and cloth making, to build up their tobacco and sugar factories, to introduce the arts as now practiced, to utilize their water power, and to make of them a thriving nation, imitating the example set them by Japan. If we do not wish for them the prosperity that comes from diversified industries and progress in the mechanical arts that build up a nation, we are unfit to be their protectors and guardians. Each should ask a preference in the other's markets by preferential tariff, but both want that tariff not only for revenue, but to protect the necessarily independent and self-supporting progress of the one against the other.

In 1900 we passed a law for a tariff between the United States and Porto Rico of 25 per cent of the Dingley rates. What I said of Porto Rico then, on February 22, 1900, is equally applicable to the Philippines now:

> It is our ward. It is for the people that we are legislating. * * * To my mind the alternative proposed of giving free trade to Porto Rico would be an unspeakable wrong to them. I say this with the less hesitation because my first impressions were in that very direction of free trade. The extension, through annexation of Porto Rico as part of the United States, to it of the Dingley tariff means, necessarily, that we also extend to them our internal revenue. No man can deny that. Otherwise they could distill liquor or make cigars, and make the things which are under our internal revenue, and could send their products free of duty into the United States.

But to extend the excise law to them means that all small manufactories should be closed and that hundreds of people should be put out of business. It means that these poor people, for they are poor, could no longer smoke cigars, because the price would be so much increased. There is not a witness who does not say that the imposition of these excise taxes would be absolutely impossible in Porto Rico, and for that reason this bill does not impose them. Free trade means more to this island. Its people have lived without machinery, without organized manufactories.

Small trades, like those of the shoemaker, the tailor, and the furniture maker, such as used to prevail with us, are there still supplying the wants of the people. All at once they would be subjected to the competition of great manufacturing industries which have almost driven these trades from without our midst and would drive them out from their island. We have welcomed the development of manufacturing in spite of that result. Our tradesmen have done better; the shoemaker became the shoe manufacturer, the tailor becomes a merchant tailor or engages in large manufactories. Our eastern farmer, who finds that the railroads have made his farm unprofitable, moves to the West, where farming pays.

Our eastern manufacturer, if his materials become too expensive, goes where those materials are cheaper. The American can move everywhere, but the Porto Rican is not an American. He speaks Spanish; he is partly of Indian blood. He can not or will not come to this country, and any measure which would put that little island immediately under the unrestricted competition of our great manufactories and drive out its small tradesmen would be an injury that we have no right to inflict.

There is one parallel case. It is Ireland. Let me ask what free trade has done for Ireland? Free trade for Ireland meant that England, the country which had the coal, the brains, and the organization, took the profits of an island that was turned into a poor farming country, on which its sister island held the title or the mortgage and from which it drew the rents. We do not mean to create this result in Porto Rico.

With free trade between Porto Rico and this country, whence is revenue to be got? Revenue is needed for roads and schools, such revenue as we always need for good government, for courts, and the administration of the laws. We can appropriate from the United States Treasury, but no one thinks that is a proper measure; or we can tax property there as we do here. Are we to increase the land taxes there upon a people whose plantations have been ruined by tornadoes? Or are we to increase a tax which they have already—the tax upon production? There every farm pays a certain proportion of its production to the government. But this produce tax is the worst kind of tax in the world, because it makes an army of assessors all over the country; because it is the most susceptible to fraud; because it is the most susceptible to oppression; because it seeks for money when there is nothing but the crop upon the ground. If that crop be taken away, the expense of its being taken away is to come out, as well as the expense of the tax collector.

We will adopt no such measure. This bill says that Porto Rico shall have what no State in this Union has ever had. It says, first, that these poor people shall have absolute freedom from the excise taxes of the United States, and from the tariff of the United States, so far as paying a single dollar into our Treasury. It says that they shall be treated as our friends. We do not ask them to contribute to our support or even to the repayment of what we have spent in the war which gave them good government. We reduce the Dingley tariff as against them by three-quarters.

We ask them only to do the same to us, and then we declare that the payments under the tariff shall not go into the Treasury of the United States, but go to the President for the benefit of the people of that island. Was ever so much generosity shown to any people? We give them just enough protection to maintain their own industries during the period of change, and we relieve them as far as we can from land tax or produce tax.

If the tariff that we lay on their goods is a tariff on their production, it is only when the goods have come here and are able to pay the tariff because at the market and the money is ready to pay for them.

And then we enact that the duties not only on goods that go to them but on goods that come here shall all go to the benefit of the island. This is what we have been told is tyranny!

What are we going to give the islands if we do not pass this bill? What are we to do for those people? How is the expense of their government to be paid?

In conclusion, only one word. It is idle to talk of law only. This is an intensely practical question. We must give some relief to these people. We must give them revenue; we must give them a reduction of the tariff; we must give them the means of getting a chance in the progress among nations. Unless that happens we might have revolution, and we shall certainly have poverty and discontent. This bill gives that relief.

On April 11, 1902, when Cuban reciprocity was under consideration, the Porto Rico tariff had been abolished. I was then sorry for it, and said so in the House, as follows:

> At the time when the Porto Rican tariff was under consideration I opposed very strongly the abolition of that tariff. I believe time will bear out my view on that subject. I believe that through a succession of good crops Porto Rico has been more prosperous than might have been expected, but, on the other hand, she has had to substitute a land tax for the old-fashioned system of taxing the products when they reach the markets; and I am very fearful that if there should be at any time any failure of the crops she will suffer the fate of all agricultural communities similarly situated—the fate that has fallen especially upon the Indian ryot—that is to say, most of her landholders will be sold out.
> I am glad the gentleman called my attention to this point. I believe that the continuation of the Porto Rican tariff would have been to the advantage of Porto Rico. For a similar reason I believe that the Philippines are rightly preserving their right to a protective tariff for their own benefit, and are taxing even our own goods that are sent there.

Mr. Chairman, these considerations as to the effects of free trade upon Porto Rico have, alas, been verified. At the request of her large planters, and with the supposition that we were benefiting that country, we have taken away from her the revenue and protection which was afforded by the small tariff between her and the United States. We have introduced our internal-revenue law, a law which is suitable to a wealthy nation, but utterly unsuitable to a poor one because of the severity of its taxation. We have driven its poor tradesmen out of business by the competition of our factory-made goods. And, remember, they can not go into our factories, but are left with no support but that of farm labor.

We have had to introduce oppressive taxes to take the place of those afforded by the tariff, and now that the wail of despair comes to us from Porto Rico let us beware of placing other communities who have made a little progress in civilization in direct rivalry with the tremendous forces of our own. Let us learn the lesson of experience. Compare the colonies of England. In India the old manufactures have been crowded out by England's cheap-made goods. The people have been impoverished. Land taxes oppress their farms and discontent prevails. Turn, then, to Canada and Australia—colonies permitted to legislate for themselves and to protect their own manufactures by tariffs, even against the home country. These colonies grow, and they are the more loyal because they are the more prosperous.

It is idle to compare the conditions in these distant territories with those in any one of the United States. Free trade is well where there is free trade in men. If western competition oppresses the New England farmer, he moves West. If factory shoes drive out the shoemaker, he goes into the factory. But the Filipinos, people of another race, can not come here and are not wanted here. We must help them to build up their own industries and to march in the progress of civilization in their own way on their own soil.

Mr. Chairman, I welcome this bill as a great step in advance. It gives to these poor people a market, and their welfare is ours. But it should also provide that articles that are wholly the product of the United States should enter the Philippines at reduced duty, even if articles wholly the product of Spain have the same privilege.

In my opinion this preferential tariff is all that is required, and absolute free trade with the islands would be an injury to them and therefore to ourselves.

APPENDIX.

Abstract of the Philippine internal-revenue law of 1904, No. 1189.

[License taxes in pesos.]

Distillers, rectifiers, and wholesale liquor dealers must pay annually	₱200.00
For a brewer the same	200.00
Retail liquor dealers pay	48.00
Retail vino	8.00
Retail beer	40.00
Wholesale beer seller	60.00
Manufacturers of tobacco or cigars	20.00
Dealer in tobacco	8.00
Beer by the liter or quart pays	.04
Spirits by the liter or quart pays	.20
Snuff, by the kilogram	.32
Chewing and smoking tobacco	.48
Cigars, per thousand, selling for less than ₱20	2.00
Cigars selling between ₱20 and ₱50 pay	4.00
Cigarettes weighing under 1 kilo per thousand pay	1.00
Cigarettes weighing over 1 kilo per thousand pay	2.00

Matches, per gross, pay 40 centavos.

Banks pay on their deposits, monthly, one-eighteenth per cent, or, by the year, two-thirds per cent.

Banks pay annually on their capital one-half per cent.

On their circulation, monthly, one-twelfth per cent, or, yearly, 1 per cent.

The stamp taxes are heavy.

	Centavos.
Corporate stocks and bonds, for ₱200 or fraction	20
Stock transfers	4
Certificate of profits	2
Bills of exchange for over ₱200	2
Foreign bills	4
Life policies or annuities, on every ₱200	10
Fire and other accident policies, on every ₱200	4
Notarial certificates	2
Receipts for over ₱30, including railroad tickets	4
Warehouse receipts	2
Bills of lading of over ₱5,000	20
Foreign passage tickets, for every ₱60 or a fraction	100

Leases under three years	50
Leases over three years	100
Mortgages, for every ₱3,000 or a fraction	50
Conveyances, for every ₱1,000	50

The cedula, or poll tax and registry, is most interesting. Every male inhabitant must yearly pay for a certificate of registration—if between January and April, ₱1; if after April, ₱2. If he does not make this purchase he is subject to imprisonment for ten days unless he has property from which the money can be made. But without this certificate of registration he is practically an outlaw and can not vote, appear in court, convey his property, pay or receive taxes, or hold office. In the words of the statute (section 125):

"The certificate of registration provided for in this article may be used for purposes of identification, admitted in evidence, and used for all the purposes to which the 'cedulas personales' were put under the Spanish laws. Any person required by law to possess a certificate of registration who does not possess one for the proper year shall not be allowed to vote in any election for public officers in the Philippine Islands. The certificates of registration shall be presented by the holder thereof whenever he or she (a) appears in any court in any capacity whatever, (b) transacts any business with any public office or officer, (c) pays any taxes or receives money from any public funds, (d) acknowledges any document before a notary public, (e) assumes any public office whether by appointment or by election, (f) receives any license, certificate, or permit from any public authority. No contract, deed, or other document acknowledged before a notary public shall be valid or recognized by any court unless the notary shall have certified thereon that the certificates of registration of all the parties thereto have been presented and shall have entered in such certificate the number, place of issue, and date of each such certificate."

Merchants and manufacturers, except farmers, exporters, and the tobacco and liquor businesses, and very small dealers, pay to the government one-third of 1 per cent of the gross value of all the goods sold. Common carriers, except carriers receiving less than ₱2,000, pay 1 per cent of their receipts. Brokers in stocks, real estate, and merchandise, and at the custom-house, pay every year a license tax of ₱80; pawnbrokers pay ₱200; theaters, museums, cockpits, or concert halls, or a circus, ₱200; every billiard table pays ₱10; every lawyer, doctor, engineer, surveyor, or auctioneer pays ₱50; every dentist, chiropodist, manicurist, photographer, lithographer, engraver, appraiser of tobacco or products pays ₱40; every veterinarian, farrier, and bicycle or wagon repairer pays ₱20; but officials are exempt. Every race track for each racing day pays ₱60. Ten days' delinquency in paying the occupation tax adds a penalty of one quarter, and refusal to pay adds a penalty of a year.

Mr. GOEBEL. Mr. Chairman, the time allotted to me will not permit any extended remarks, and I shall attempt in a brief way to state my reasons for opposing this measure. The purpose of this measure is to establish after April 11, 1909, absolute free trade between the Philippine Islands and the United States. That seems to me to be an extraordinary measure urged by a Republican Administration. Its justification, however, is maintained on the ground that we owe to the Filipinos, by reason of our relation to them, a duty, quoting the language of the distinguished Secretary of War. He said:

If we are sincere, if we are conscientious, if we desire to be really altruistic in our position to the Philippines and the Filipinos, then we have no right to deny them the benefit which commercial association and freedom of trade as a part of our civilization will give them. A Filipino will question the good faith of our declaration that we are there for their good when we decline to open our ports to their products and refuse to give them the benefits of the markets of this great country for the things which they have to sell.

I have, Mr. Chairman, listened with care to many of the speeches which have been made on the floor of this House, and I have read with care the speech of the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means in the hope that some other reason may be urged for the support of this measure. But, summing it all up, the paramount reason remains that we must be sincere in our love and affection for the "little brown fellow" and his savage brothers. For their welfare and prosperity we must put into jeopardy the industries of our great Commonwealth, and we must bring into active competition with our American labor the cheap labor of these islands, and from a Republican standpoint, we must sacrifice the great underlying principles of protection which have so long been maintained by that great party, and which have contributed so much to the uplifting and building up of this great nation. [Applause.] I wish I could bring myself to the belief that in my desire to aid the Filipinos at this time I am discharging my whole duty to the people of our country. I commend the Administration for the great work which it has performed in the Philippine Islands. Much more is to be done. I would protect them, I would uplift them, and aid them to civilization and self-government. Our position as to the islands is an anomalous one. The relation of guardian and ward exists, and while that simply means that they have a right to insist upon such obligations as that relation calls for, they have no right to insist upon a higher or greater duty. [Applause.]

For purposes of tariff and revenue the islands have been treated by us as foreign country, and our relations applicable and incident in that regard as to any other foreign country have been adhered to and maintained as to these islands, and justly so. But it is now sought to wipe out that relation and place the islands upon the same footing of the several States of the Union. If conditions were such that these islands were more contiguous to our shores, that the people were our kind of people, that they were a class desired, there might be reason for this action; but when we consider their condition, contributing nothing to the welfare of our people, a people wholly unfit for self-government, with no possibility in the near future that they will be able to control their own domestic affairs, and when we are still in doubt as to what disposition shall be made of these islands, then it does seem to me that we are going a great length in giving them this relief. I know it has been urged that the relief granted by this measure, "free trade," is but little, and that we could afford in that regard to be generous. It either will be a great benefit or it will not. Why try the experiment? If it will be a benefit, so much greater is the danger to our people. It may be that the Filipino will not be able to take advantage of the situation, and will not grow and prosper so as to actively come with his products and his labor into competition with our American products and our American labor. That necessarily would be his fault, yet there is the soil, the cheap labor, the opportunity. It would open the door for others to benefit and to take advantage of the situation. The danger lies in permitting a wedge to be driven into that door with a possibility that at some other time another wedge, and still another wedge might be driven in, and by and by you will have broken down all the safeguards of protection and made it possible for different conditions.

I have been taught that a tariff high enough to prevent foreign products and foreign labor to come into competition with our own products and labor is the kind of protection which the Republican party stands for. [Applause.] I hope the time has not come when it is necessary in order to show our good faith to the Filipinos to violate those principles. Mr. Chairman, it will be observed that the tariff on sugar and tobacco is to be reduced 25 per cent of the present rate, and after April 11, 1909, to be entirely wiped out. Those are two of the most staple articles this country produces. I have no familiarity with the sugar industries, for little or no sugar beets and no cane sugar is raised in my district, but the State of Ohio is fourth in order of the greatest tobacco-producing States in the Union. In the year 1904 she produced in leaf tobacco 50,793,123 pounds. The average acreage was 59,827 and the yield was 849 pounds per acre. The total farm value was $4,063,450. The total number of cigars manufactured in the State of Ohio was 699,995,998, there being but two other States in the Union which exceed Ohio in the manufacture of cigars. Statistics also show that the total import duties paid in the United States during the fiscal year 1904 on tobacco and manufactures thereof was $21,176,293.09, and the total internal revenue from tobacco for the fiscal year 1904 was $44,655,808.75, making a total of $65,832,101.84. The internal-revenue receipts of the United States for the fiscal year 1905 were $45,659,910. This amount was paid on cigars, cigarettes, snuff, chewing and smoking tobacco. Now, Mr. Chairman, this is a great industry; the revenues to the Government have been enormous and essential to its operation. Involved in that enterprise is the capital, the earnings, and labor of thousands upon thousands of our people. Let us be generous to our wards, but let us be just to our people. [Loud applause.]

Mr. LAMB. Mr. Chairman, the discussion on this measure has taken a wide range and embraced about as many subjects as the President's message sent us at the beginning of the session. The arguments have been able and suggestive. I can not hope to add anything, and would not say a word save that, in my judgment, Virginia's views should be heard here. I have been waiting for the older Members in years and experience to speak. Since they leave this to the most modest and youthful of the delegation I desire to say that Virginia has always opposed taxation without representation. Her sons fought against this in 1776 and her record is emblazoned on the monument at Yorktown. She believes that the Philippines are a part of this country and should not be treated as foreign territory. As one of her Representatives I shall vote for a free exchange of products between those islands and the States of this Union.

If the beet-sugar men on the other side of this Chamber will vote with us we can defeat the pending measure. So far from injuring them it will help us all by hastening the day when we shall be rid of these islands.

I take it that every Representative here, regardless of party, would be glad to dispose of the Philippines. For my part I would give them away to-morrow. If we will treat these people as we do Hawaii and Porto Rico, and develop their resources, we can soon dispose of them, either by granting them independence or transferring them to Japan. Why not do this at the earliest possible time?

With one-fourth of our own territory unoccupied and our resources as yet undeveloped, and problems of race and government staring us in the face demanding solution, why exhaust our energies in the Orient?

This road has been traveled by nations who preceded us to their undoing. Wouldn't it be well to profit by their experiences?

When the people of the United States learn the facts touching these islands, as they will in great part from the discussions had here during the progress of this debate, they will demand that we get rid of them, and the sooner they do this the better it will be for this Republic.

This debate has demonstrated one thing, that we need not fear any competition from tobacco and sugar made in the Philippines. The beet-sugar men are only scared; they will not be hurt. I represent tobacco raisers and tobacco manufacturers; they are shedding no tears save over the tyranny of the American Tobacco Company. If any of you gentlemen will devise some measure for destroying the American Tobacco Company you will go down to posterity as a benefactor. [Applause.] The people of several States in this Union will rise up and call you blessed. [Applause.] When the grand old party has revised the tariff and fixed the railroad rates we hope they will turn their batteries on the trusts.

We see around us evidences that the Republican party are hopelessly divided on this tariff question. They can no longer hold their people by declaring that the Democratic party is a free-trade party, for it never was and never can be.

When Democrats cease, as they are fast doing, the cry of "robber tariff" and declare for a tariff for revenue, with incidental protection, they will sweep this country. I look for this House to be carried in part by this issue next November. The Senate will follow in four years, and the Presidency as a natural consequence. Then we will dispose of the Philippines and not be responsible for slavery there or anywhere. Then we will free the beet-sugar men and have many of them for our allies.

The Republican party, hoary with age, intoxicated with power, and reckless of consequences, must reform or die. Can it reform without dying? This question, no doubt, its leaders are asking. Nature, science, religion all teach that corruption can not produce incorruption save it die. And die it will. We young men will be here to preach its funeral. [Applause.]

It came into being amidst the throes of a revolution. God grant it may go out in peace. The claims made for it on the floor of this House in the past four days are extravagant and amusing. The distinguished gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. HILL] claims that this party freed the negroes. Was it a constitutional or a revolutionary party when it did this thing? Did the whole of the Federal Army belong to the Republican party? The border States furnished 330,000 men for that conflict. Does any man believe that 20 per cent of them were Republicans? Do you recall the popular vote for McClellan in 1864?

If the border-State men had been on the other side in that conflict, who could have freed the negroes? I will tell you. The respective States of this Union. Virginia came within one vote of freeing hers in 1832. I happened to mention this to a gentleman on the other side of this Chamber a few days ago, one of the many over there whom I appreciate highly, and he was astonished. I could tell him a good deal more of Virginia history that would delight him, and hope he will come to Richmond, where I can entertain him and show him some of the best specimens of men and women on this continent. He must stay longer and learn more, however, than my friend from Wisconsin [Mr. ADAMS], who said in a speech on this floor on the 11th of this month:

> A few months ago I had occasion to go down to Virginia to the beautiful city of Richmond and address a large gathering of farmers from every State in the Union. I came in personal contact with many ex-Confederate officers, dyed in the wool Democrats—good fellows, as we know them to be—and three out of four told me they were glad Theodore Roosevelt was elected, because the election of a Republican President meant the continuation of the protective tariff policy and greater prosperity, not only for the North, but prosperity for the South.

I happened to be over in the library when this remarkable statement was made or I would have at the time called attention to the fact that the election returns of 1904 for President showed that Parker received 3,749 votes and Roosevelt received 569 votes in Richmond. The negroes and a few white Republicans furnished the 569 votes. Perhaps there are a dozen ex-Confederate soldiers in Richmond who vote the Republican ticket. I do not know as many, while I do know a good number of white men who are Republicans.

A lady in my district was trying on one occasion to impress her little child with the importance of always telling the truth. She cited, as is always the habit, I think, in Virginia, the incident of Washington and his hatchet. Then it came the time for the child to interrogate. She said: "Ma, did you ever tell a story?" After some hesitation the lady had to admit that she had offended in this way. Then the child asked, "Ma, did papa ever tell a story?" This was likely easier to answer, and the wife had to say, "Papa may have told little stories when he was courting." Sadly the little girl remarked, "Oh, ma, I will be so lonesome in heaven. There will be no one there but George Washington and myself." [Laughter.] I just want to say that those ex-Confederate officers who "three out of every four" sung that song to my good friend from Wisconsin will stand slim chance for sitting down with George Washington and that dear Virginia child in the kingdom of heaven. [Laughter.]

The fact is that my friend was so enraptured with the city of Richmond and so delighted with the reception he and the distinguished gentleman from Georgia [Mr. LIVINGSTON] received that he thought every man he met must be a Republican. He saw such evidences of growth and prosperity that he was bewildered when some man said to him, "We are for a tariff for revenue and this gives incidental protection." He multiplied them by three and assumed that he must be a Confederate officer. He told me that he thought the beat biscuit that a farmer's wife gave him "Massachusetts crackers," and that something they had called "batter bread" beat anything he had ever eaten. If he had remained there two weeks he would have gotten some flesh on his bones and learned not to take ex-Confederate soldiers too seriously when they are entertaining angels unawares. [Laughter.]

Then I must remind my friend and inform this House that the farmers' convention, with the citizens of Richmond, applauded to the echo the splendid speech of the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. LIVINGSTON], who made a plea for a freer trade, not free trade. The western men predominated largely in that convention. They gave the gentleman from Wisconsin a good send off, and we enjoyed his speech. I also enjoyed some sentences in the one from which I have quoted. See where he places you "stand-patters:"

> The Republic will see the friends of this bill joining with the free-trade Democracy to diminish the protection which is to-day received by the men upon the farms of this country.

I reached the House as the gentleman from Wisconsin was closing. I asked him to continue. He said he was too tired. He has hurt himself smoking those cigars from Manila. They are too strong for fatter men than he. [Laughter.]

I wished to ask him some questions that would arouse him to tell this House something about Richmond. I would have told this long ago but for my extreme modesty, that oppresses me fearfully. [Laughter.] He might have told you that a city of 36,000 souls in 1865, with one-third of its territory destroyed by fire, numbered now nearly 100,000, and was the fourth richest per capita in the United States, notwithstanding the fact that over 30,000 of the inhabitants are negroes; that these negroes are the most thrifty, perhaps, in the country and the best behaved; that they vote upon a property and educational qualification just as the white man votes.

This prosperity has come not by reason of but in spite of your high protective tariff. Three years ago we had sixty-four independent manufacturers of tobacco in Virginia, to-day we have twenty-four. The American Tobacco Company has absorbed the forty.

Session before last we passed a bill through this House forbidding the use of coupons and the gift-giving feature on manufactured tobacco and cigarettes. The trusts were able to defeat this bill. They seem to be strong enough to defeat any reform measure offered here.

THE DEMOCRATIC PARTY NOT A FREE-TRADE PARTY.

The claim that the Democratic party is a free-trade party can not be maintained.

This claptrap argument will be heard on every stump in the country next fall. The history of eight Administrations under Democratic rule gives contradiction to this false and misleading statement.

The advocates of a high tariff claim that the great prosperity for the past few years is the result of tariff legislation. This argument is almost too weak to deserve an answer. The facts are that this prosperity has come in spite of and not by reason of the tariff.

It has come from the immense exports of agricultural products; from a demand created by war; from the skill and enterprise of our citizens; from the unexpected and wonderful discoveries of gold, that have made good beyond dispute the Democratic contentions of 1896 and 1900.

The weak, not to say wicked, charge that business depression follows Democratic success is without foundation in fact. Our opponents ofter refer to the Wilson tariff bill as proof of this, thus exposing their ignorance. The Wilson tariff enacted in 1894 could not have produced the crisis that came in May, 1893, seventeen months before any tariff change.

The Democratic contention for a tariff for revenue with incidental protection is proved correct under the workings of the Walker tariff. The greatest era of prosperity this country has ever enjoyed was during the operation of this tariff of 1846. Our commerce went forward by leaps and bounds. Our American clippers became famous in song and story; the great era of railroad building began. Then all our people, including the manufacturers, enjoyed a prosperity the like of which had never been known before.

Since the Republican party stands on its record in the past and boasts of its age and experience, it may be well to glance at its history. An evil genius presided at its natal hour and smote it with the spirit of jealousy and envy and all uncharitableness. A sectional party in every sense of the word, it began its career by setting at defiance the supreme law of this land and through its chosen orators declared that our glorious Constitution was a covenant with death and a league with hell.

The contempt it felt for this noble instrument was clearly shown when in defiance of the famous Senate resolution of 1861, as well as that of 1865, instructing General Grant to make his southern tour, it disregarded his report, deliberately overthrew the policy of President Johnson, and established an oppressive, undemocratic, and unconstitutional rule in the Southern States. It divided these States into five military districts and appointed a brigadier-general of the Army to govern them. It overlooked section 4, Article IV, of the Constitution, which declares:

> The United States shall guarantee to every State in this Union a republican form of government.

A fitting sequel to this cruel and inhuman work was the forcing of the fourteenth and fifteenth amendments upon the South. The pagan world in all its darkness never conceived such political iniquity. A Roman province revolted and was put down by armed force. The question arose in the Roman Senate, "What shall be done with these people?" The radical element cried out, "Disfranchise them; confiscate their property;" but nowhere was it said, "Make them vassals to their slaves." This crime against civilization and humanity was reserved through the dark ages to be inaugurated for the first time under the light of the nineteenth century and by the representatives of this grand old party of moral ideas.

Its infamous and futile attempt to impeach a President who stood with one hand on the Constitution and the other stretched over the shattered Commonwealths of this Southland furnishes another example of its high-handed and outrageous conduct.

Owing to the hurried march of events and the strenuous life of Americans, they have almost forgotten the attack the Republican party made on the Supreme Court in the Legal Tender cases.

Examine the history of the Republican party from the end of the civil war to the present time and you will find it step by step disregarding the mandates of the Constitution and violating its spirit.

On the morning of the 8th of November, 1876, it was proclaimed that Samuel J. Tilden had been elected President. It was true. He had over 250,000 majority and 196 electoral votes.

The crime by which he was robbed of his well-earned victory is a lasting shame and disgrace upon this party that appeals with pride to its record. On that trying day only two courses were left, war or compromise. The memories of the civil war prevented another at that time.

But you say these things are in the past. The party is not what it was. We have reformed, so to speak. Your sins of omission nearly equal your sins of commission. You boast of establishing the gold standard. Have you done this? Let the four hundred and forty-six million of silver dollars and the three hundred and thirty-six million of greenback currency unredeemed and unprovided for save in small part bear witness. What of your currency reform? The bankers all over this mighty land are now calling your attention to this practical legislation. What about the immigration laws so urgent, so absolutely necessary, if you are in earnest when you say, "We must protect our American laborers from the pauper labor of Europe?"

These questions were all postponed in the last Congress that your party might once more deceive and mislead a too credulous constituency. You represent the principles of force and centralized power in the Federal head. We stand for the imperishable rights of local self-government. You advocate tariff duties that are prohibitory and likely to bring us into serious complications with foreign powers, while they shelter the trusts and retard, if they do not destroy, our shipbuilding interests. We stand for a tariff for revenue, with incidental protection, that will produce revenue sufficient to carry on the Government and at the same time safeguard every American interest.

When the American voters once consider calmly and dispassionately the issues between the two contending parties they will decide against you. Then will begin a brighter and better era in this country, and our grand Republic, the exemplar of freedom and the hope of humanity, will have fair promise of accomplishing its manifest destiny. When under the providence of God, in the fullness of time, this boon shall come the historian shall make record that Virginia gave the statesman to America whose political philosophy shaped the course of events and laid solid and deep the foundations upon which rests the grandest structure of human government that ever arose to bless mankind. [Loud applause.]

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, I presume that a sigh of relief will arise, not only from the Members of this House, but from the country at large, when the hour of 5 o'clock arrives, because at that time general debate upon the pending bill will close, the Members will be relieved from further listening and the country from reading a discussion which has continued for more than a week, and which in many instances contains a confusion of ideas, in some is tinctured with apparent logic, and in others with extreme sophistry. The fact has been disclosed that the stand-patters who believe that the Dingley tariff schedules are sacred for some other unaccountable reason assert that they will vote with the most pronounced free trader, largely from a sentimental standpoint, in matters pertaining to the Filipino, so-called "our little Brown Brother." In the brief time which I am permitted to occupy the attention of the House I must of necessity confine my statements to a few general remarks, almost wholly devoid of statistics, and shall define my position upon the pending bill as succinctly as possible.

First, I am a protectionist along Republican lines, as enunciated by our party since its formation, namely, that in conjunction with the raising of revenue with which to sustain our Government a tariff duty should be laid upon certain imports to encourage American industries, and in order that the American laborer may receive just compensation for his services. To this principle I attribute, in a large measure, the past and present prosperous condition of our country. A protective tariff such as this had its origin when the manufacturing industries of this land were in their extreme infancy, in fact, and the result of this policy produced many new industries, some of which still remain small in stature, but has also produced others of prodigious size, greater than any ever before known in the annals of the world. When, however, an industry, which has been fostered by this system, has grown so large, so wealthy, and so powerful that it can produce the articles in its line cheaper in price and better in quality than can be produced in the older nations of the world, even with their cheap labor, then in my judgment this policy of protection has fully accomplished its purpose and from thenceforth should be withheld. I believe that certain of our industries, and especially the one which now monopolizes and controls our oil industry, need no further protection; that the steel and iron industry, which is dominated by what is known as the "United Steel Corporation" to such an extent that it monopolizes and controls the production and output of this country and arbitrarily fixes the price therefor, is able to stand alone without further governmental aid; also that the lumber, coal, glass, and tin industries can be classed in this same category, with many others which I will not stop to mention. Again, when any particular industry becomes so powerful that it can or does control the output and regulate the price of any commodity, it is the duty of the American Congress to see to it at once that legislation be passed removing such protection. Also that the American consumer should be protected against this monopolist. True protection means protecting the whole people, and very often a downward revision is not only imperatively demanded, and is as much in the line of protection, as revising the tariff upward. Being a Republican and a friend of the protective policy, properly adjusted and administered, my desire is that when revision comes it should be brought about by the Republican party, and it is quite apparent that this time has now arrived, and that the American people, by a vast majority in number of all political parties, demand revision at this time and of the downward kind.

The Republican doctrine, as strenuously taught heretofore, and is good to-day, was and is, that protection properly adjusted and administered in these United States would so rapidly increase any commodity that within a very few years the price to the consumer would be greatly decreased. True it was, that temporarily, or shortly after the Old World was excluded from our market, the price of the finished product to the consumer was necessarily enhanced; yet ultimately and as soon as the industry was thoroughly established, that, together with the resultant competition among our own people, caused the reduction in price. Instances of this character have been very numerous, and certainly the Republicans in this House are aware of them, because that was the burden of their campaign speeches, and history proves the truth of the claim. As an instance I cite that when the tariff was put upon lead a few years ago, shortly thereafter the price of lead was actually lower than the tariff. Many kinds of cotton goods could be instanced in which the same result was accomplished. When the Republican party through a protective tariff induced the manufacture of tin in this country, scoffers were numerous, claiming that it was folly to attempt to compete with this industry in Wales. But that is all dissipated now, for to-day the American tin can readily compete with all the world and needs no further protection. Mr. Chairman, party lines on the subject under discussion are badly mixed. Apparently each individual, whether Republican or Democrat, expresses his views based upon some particular principle which he champions; free trade being the principle of some, stand-pat protection of others. Our plain duty and justice to the Filipino is the guiding principle of a few; but it remains for the eminent chairman of the Ways and Means Committee [Mr. PAYNE] to first introduce in this discussion the idea or principle called "sentiment" in behalf of the half-civilized Filipino.

I wish, Mr. Chairman, to introduce another idea which I think is material in the consideration of the main question involved in the bill under discussion. It is the word "confidence," and it is not unfamiliar in Republican parlance. Before doing so, however, I quote the Republican platform of 1896, which was as follows: "We condemn the present Administration for not keeping faith with the sugar producers of this country. The Republican party favors such protection as will lead to the production on American soil of all the sugar which the American people use, and for which they pay other countries more than $100,000,000 annually." Mr. Chairman, during the great and memorable campaign of 1896 the word "confidence" was the battle cry to rally to our standard the voters of the United States in order to secure what we then declared to be of the greatest importance, namely, the gold standard, and thus secure the stability of our currency. In my opinion this word "confidence" was then properly used, and this principle had a material effect in deciding that election, and in fact all others subsequent. Every platform orator loudly proclaimed the necessity for confidence in the stability of our currency in order to encourage the investment of capital in our industries; that sound money and a protective tariff would breed such confidence that renewed vigor would be inspired and prosperity to all would surely follow, and it did. Without confidence man is generally without hope, but with confidence hope and success follow. Without confidence the capitalist will not invest his means in any enterprise. The Dingley law was passed by the Republican party in 1897. At that time there were only six beet-sugar factories in the United States. At once, after the passage of this law and relying implicitly upon the Republican platform of 1896, men of capital, brains, and energy began constructing numerous other beet-sugar factories, and such was the remarkable growth of this industry that during the succeeding six years the number of these factories in more than one-third of the States of the Union had increased to fifty-two, and all doing a thriving and successful business, furnishing employment to thousands of laborers at good wage and making glad the hearts of the farmer in the raising of hundreds of thousands of tons of sugar beets.

Also at this time there were in contemplation of construction fifty-one other factories, and the business had gained such an impetus that only a few more years were required until a sufficient quantity of refined sugar would have been produced to have supplied the entire consumption of the United States. But, alas, during the year 1903 a law was enacted known as the "Cuban reciprocity law," similar in effect and on all fours with the proposed legislation now under discussion. It permitted the introduction into this country of all raw sugar grown in Cuba at the reduced tariff of 20 per cent of the Dingley law. Stimulated by this law the sugar production of Cuba was increased many fold. Without stopping to attempt to analyze whether that law is in fact detrimental to our beet-sugar industry, yet there can be no doubt that lack of confidence is what called the halt in the construction of any more factories in this country, and to-day the number of factories in existence is about the same as in 1903.

Mr. Chairman, however, recently in some parts of the United States the spirit of progress in this line has again been awakened, and in the district which I represent in Minnesota a new factory, costing the sum of $750,000, is now being erected with a capacity of manufacturing 750 tons of beets daily into refined sugar. The location of this factory is propitious, the quality and character of the soil of the very best for the purpose of raising sugar beets, and the territory ample. A sufficient quantity of beets are now already contracted for, to be grown and delivered by the farmers in that vicinity. They are confident and hopeful, that this industry, being started in their midst by the capital of their friends and neighbors will not only be a success, but that this Government will not for any reason, sentimental or otherwise, toward the millions of the semi-civilized tribes that inhabit the Philippine Islands, pass any law detrimental to their interests or bring their labor to the level of these inferior tribes. Therefore I beseech you, in the name of the American farmer and investors of capital in beet-sugar factories, not to pass this bill, for if you do, and it becomes a law, you will shake the confidence of every American sugar-beet and sugar-cane producer in the United States.

I am not going to discuss or attempt to point out the exact amount of damage or benefit which will result from the passage of this bill. Neither do I believe that this Congress can at this time assert with any definiteness what the result will be, and I call the attention of the House and of the country to the various discussions had thus far in support of my contention, that all is but conjecture. The chief supporters of the bill at times strenuously contend, that the Filipino has neither the stamnia, intelligence, vigor, nor land wherewith to produce sugar in any quantity, at any time, to materially affect the American sugar producer. They argue that the Filipino is shiftless and lazy and will only work sufficient to maintain his existence. They further argue that the quantity of land in the Philippine Islands adapted to and upon which sugar can be grown is so small in area as to be immaterial, and in support of this last contention they present charts and maps, highly colored and entertaining to look at, and explain the same with volubility. Their figures and other data in this connection are so voluminous as to incite dizziness. Again, some of these supporters have, perhaps unguardedly, shown that the Filipino is capable of doing a vast amount of labor, equal or greater than that of any other nationality in or transported to their islands, and that vast areas of lands of the choicest and richest variety are now under cultivation in sugar cane, and much more is susceptible thereof. I shall not attempt to reconcile these various claims, but will stand upon the record evidence of such great and eminent statesmen as our present Secretary of War, Hon. William H. Taft, formerly Governor Taft of the islands, and General Wright, the present governor.

Each of these honorable gentlemen have extensive knowledge on the subject; their opportunities have been such that statements coming from them should carry great weight and, to my mind, are conclusive. Governor Wright, in his testimony before the Philippine Committee, in December, 1902, says that the soil of the Philippines is as good or better than that of Hawaii and will produce as much or more sugar per acre. Secretary Taft, in his testimony before the Insular Committee, states, in substance and as a fact, that these islands are, in respect to soil, climate, and labor conditions, capable of indefinite extension along the line of the production of sugar; and when asked by Mr. Moody if, in his judgment, the sugar of the world could not be produced there, he answered, "Yes;" and from this same authority we are given to know that these islands have very much more arable land and very much richer soil than have the Japanese islands, which support 48,000,000 people. Mr. Buencamino, who is certainly authority on this subject, testified before the Insular Committee that in the Philippine Islands there are 50,000,000 acres of land richer than the lands of either Hawaii or the United States. This, Mr. Chairman, is sufficient testimony for me to conclude, in the language of Governor Taft, that these islands can and probably will in the near future produce almost sugar enough to supply the whole world.

But the proponents and advocates of this bill urge that the Filipino will not produce large quantities of raw material (and certainly they will never produce the finished product). In this contention I heartily agree. This fact, however, will not prevent the sugar lands in the islands from being exploited by outside sources. The area of the islands consists of 73,000,000 acres, in round numbers, of which a little over 68,000,000 are public lands owned by the government. Fifty million acres are very rich, and, according to the best estimates that I can obtain, about one million and a half acres of this land would grow sufficient sugar cane, properly managed, to supply the entire sugar consumption of the United States. I do not expect that the Filipino within himself will ever produce this quantity of sugar, but recent events in Cuba have demonstrated that outside capital has been the means of very rapidly increasing the acreage and production of raw sugar in Cuba about a million tons in the last six years. Is there any reason to suppose that this same procedure will not be had shortly after the passage of this bill in the Philippine Islands? Existing law, as I am informed, limits the quantity of land that may be purchased or held by any prospective sugar corporation in the islands to 2,500 acres. But Governor Taft, in his testimony before the Philippine Committee, says that that quantity of land is insufficient; that even 5,000 acres is too small a quantity to be thus owned, and suggests and recommends that the area be increased to 20,000 acres, and this recommendation has again been made in the year 1904, thus showing that the idea is prevalent, and it is in contemplation, that there are prospective sugar corporations contemplating the exploitation in the near future of large areas of this land, in case the duty on raw sugar is reduced by the passage of this bill and ultimately abrogated altogether in the year 1909, and to my mind this conclusion is irresistible.

Mr. Chairman, legislation is obtained not only for the present but for the future, and certainly this bill makes it not only possible, but it is apparently quite probable that these large sugar corporations will ultimately exploit these lands in the manner I have suggested. Can this result be other than detrimental to the cane and beet sugar industries of the United States?

Mr. MONDELL. Will the gentleman yield to me for a question?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Minnesota yield to the gentleman from Wyoming?

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. I do.

Mr. MONDELL. In the relation of the gentleman's argument I want to ask him if it is not true that this stimulus has brought about the expansion of the sugar industry in Hawaii, so that at this time four-fifths of the arable area of those lands is in sugar?

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. I am informed that it is so. I do not pretend to be thoroughly posted on the subject, yet that is my information.

Mr. MONDELL. It is a fact, and they produce 5 tons of sugar per acre per annum. And in the line of the statement the gentleman has just made, is it not fair to assume that the same kind of development will occur in the Philippine Islands?

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. I am inclined to believe so, and assert that such evidence as I have comes from such authority as Governor Taft, who is, or ought to be, familiar with the conditions, having resided in the islands for a number of years, and also from General Wright, who is the present governor. That was their testimony recently, and I am convinced that such will be the case.

Mr. Chairman, I do not believe, after listening to the discussion, and neither did I believe it before I heard it, that the Filipino, unaided in his semi-civilized condition, and, as the testimony discloses, almost savage, no matter what the area of land of the islands, or how choice, would ever produce sufficient sugar to jeopardize our American industries. Neither do I believe, and I base this upon the statement which I have heard uttered upon this floor, that the Hawaiians would ever have produced as much sugar as is now being done, were it not in consequence of outside capital and aid. My belief in this regard also extends to Cuba, which is much older than the United States in point of civilization under Spanish rule, but as soon as the American people temporarily took possession of the island of Cuba and relieved them of certain of our tariff duties then it was that the large sugar plantations were exploited, not by their own capital or energy, but by Americans, until their output of sugar has increased about a million tons during the last five or six years.

Mr. Chairman, I can but anticipate that a similar result will speedily follow if this bill now under consideration is enacted into law.

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. Is not the gentleman aware that Cuba has about the same production of sugar to-day that she had several years ago, and that there has been no such increase over her normal production as the gentleman speaks of?

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. My information is that during the last six years the production of raw sugar in Cuba has increased 1,000,000 tons.

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. Then the increase is undoubtedly over the production at the time of the late war. But if the gentleman will look back and study the statistics of sugar production in Cuba, I think he will find that the amount produced at the very highest point does not exceed, if it equals, what was produced several years ago, before the Spanish war began.

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. I shall not contradict the gentleman's statement.

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. I can not give the exact figures, but I think the gentleman will find that statement is correct.

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. I shall not contradict the gentleman's statement, because since his trip to the Philippine Islands, judging from the three hours' speech that he made here the other day, he has become an expert on the subject of tobacco. He delivered a discourse of about three hours on the "ethics" of tobacco raising. I was surprised also to hear the gentleman from California assert that that trip—I do not want to misquote him—was gotten up and instigated for the purpose of passing this bill; in other words that the trip was an incident of a bill which had been formulated before, and not the bill an incident of the trip. Now, we find the gentleman from Connecticut, when he puts his mind upon a subject, is capable of surrounding more figures in a short space of time than anyone I ever knew, and I think more than anyone who ever sat on the floor of this House.

But the chairman of the Ways and Means Committee tells you that his study upon that matter was for the purpose of doing justice to the Philippines. He says it is a matter of sentiment. As to whether they will be in any way benefited is problematical. Mr. Chairman, if the Filipino is not to be benefited, who is? Is the American sugar producer to be benefited? I can not see how or why. If the Filipino is not to be benefited, if the American sugar producer is not to be benefited, if the cost of sugar to the consumer is not to be reduced—and no one has claimed that it will be, but on the contrary facts and statistics all show that even with the increased production and shipment to this country from Hawaii, Porto Rico, and Cuba, the cost to the consumer has not only not been reduced, but has been increased in the last two or three years—if all these things are so, who can be benefited? There can only be one class or set of men who can be benefited under those conditions. It has been stated on the floor of this House that there are one or two concerns, the so-called "sugar trust" and a Mr. Spreckels, who purchase nearly, if not quite, all the raw sugar that enters our ports and refine the same. They dispose of it to the consumer. Now, if the Filipino is not benefited, if the American sugar producer is not benefited, if the sugar consumer does not get cheaper sugar, who is the beneficiary then except these two institutions which refine and dispose of that sugar?

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. Will the gentleman yield to me for a question?

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. Yes; I do not say I can answer your question, however.

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. I think the gentleman can answer the question. It is not a technical one in any sense, and I appreciate the gentleman's judgment. If the sugar trust and the tobacco trust are to be benefited by this legislation——

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. I have not said anything about the tobacco trust.

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. I am going to bring them in here. Why is it that the representatives of both of them appeared before the Ways and Means Committee and opposed this bill?

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. I can not answer the gentleman in that respect, but I can state to the gentleman that within my knowledge I have known transactions both from a legal standpoint and otherwise wherein, as a matter of fact, the man who pretended to oppose a proposition was secretly encouraging it. I do not say that is the case here, but I have known of instances of that kind.

Mr. Chairman, I deny the statement that the Filipino is our little "Brown Brother." No doubt he is brown, and no doubt, according to the idea that under Adam all men are kin, he may be our brother, but that is the only way in which he is so. He is not our brother as I look upon our American civilization and population. He has nothing whatever in common with us; and while it may be stated that the Philippine Islands belong to this domain in a certain sense temporarily, yet I assert that they are only temporarily under our charge; and it is the ultimate object of the Republican party, according to my idea, to turn them adrift and let them look out for themselves as soon as capable of self-government.

Mr. Chairman, I do not believe that they are entitled to our sympathy, except wherein we can aid and encourage them in the building up of industries that possibly may in the future redound to our credit. If, however, we seek to aid and encourage them, let us do it along lines that will not in any manner affect or injure any American industry. [Applause.] Now, Mr. Chairman, practical aid to the Filipinos should far outrun sentiment. Let us, by protection or otherwise, encourage and aid them in growing immense quantities of coffee, for their island is adapted to that, and thus enable them to supply us with about $85,00,000 worth which we are obliged annually to import. Also aid and encourage them in producing the $50,000,000 worth of rubber and gutta-percha, which we annually import. Also aid and encourage them in producing fifteen or twenty million dollars worth of sisal grass, and nine or ten million dollars worth of cocoa which we are obliged annually to import, and other products, amounting to millions, of the natural products of their soil such as we can not possibly raise. Our annual import of these various tropical products, which they can produce in the greatest abundance and which we can not produce at all, amount in the aggregate to about two hundred million annually. This can all be done by the Filipino with slight aid and encouragement, and they would thereby be greatly benefited in fact, not sentimentally, and then their productions would not be brought in competition with our American industry.

Mr. Chairman, the American people are a practical people. They believe, first, in aiding and encouraging their own people, and then, if they have any charity to send it abroad. But if they do send that charity abroad, they do not believe in sending it abroad in the form of sentiment. They believe in sending abroad something that is material. We are sending to the Filipinos school-teachers, and we are investing our money in all ways for their benefit; but up to date we have not done it in such a manner as to discourage any industry in the United States. I firmly believe that if this bill is defeated, inside of the next five or ten years the beet-sugar industry in the United States will be so wonderfully developed, so enormously increased, that we will produce our own sugar and all we consume right upon this continent. [Applause.] I believe that when we arrive at that stage then the sugar-beet industry and the cane industry of this country will be independent of and above the reach and control of any sugar trust on earth. But as long as you leave the industry in its present struggling condition, those who are engaged in it will be very easily discouraged. They will lack the confidence which is necessary for the development of that enterprise. They will not build new factories as long as they find that the Congress of the United States does not propose to stand by, and back them, and encourage them.

I am a firm believer in the Republican party. I want it to revise the tariff. I want it to do so very soon. I want it to do so along lines that will be productive of the most good; and whenever an industry is found that has grown so large that those engaged in it can monopolize the entire product, and not only monopolize the production, but the output and sale of it and control the price of it, then I think the consumer is the man who should receive protection against mammoth organizations of that kind, instead of the organization itself receiving the protection. I believe the consumer at the present time is entitled to some thought and some consideration.

Thus far, since the passage of the Dingley law, none of the schedules has been touched, or threatened, or talked about except one schedule, and that is the schedule in which the farmer is interested. We talk about Canadian reciprocity. I believe in Canadian reciprocity, but I believe it should comprise all schedules, and do not believe in singling out wheat, oats, corn, butter, and goods that come in direct competition with the farmers along our border, and at the same time compel the farmers to pay the steel trust or the manufacturers of steel and iron and the implements manufactured therefrom the full protective price.

As I have before stated, I am thoroughly in sympathy with, and much desire a speedy, just, and equitable revision of the tariff. I believe that the many inequalities that now exist in the present Dingley law, which inequalities have become very apparent owing to changed conditions, should be remedied. I believe that when this revision is made it should be made all along the line. I believe that the free list should be enlarged so as to include every item where it is demonstrated that protection is no longer needed.

I believe that it is unjust and unfair that the American farmer and stock raiser should be the only one to be revised. The agriculturists of our country are willing and ready at all times to bear their share of any proper burden. Uncomplainingly they will pay any tax levied upon an equitable basis. The American farmer, and especially those along the border line between Canada and the United States, are willing, in my judgment, to compete with his neighbors of the Dominion, and allow the great mills of Minneapolis—the greatest in the world—to grind his wheat into flour, provided, on the other hand, the manufacturer of the machinery with which he cultivates the land that raises his crop will remove the tariff on his wares, thus allowing the user of this farm machinery to purchase the same in the open markets of the world.

If you will give to the farmer the reaper, the mowing machine, the thrasher, and all other implements of husbandry at open-market prices, with tariff removed, then, Mr. Chairman, the farmers of this country are willing to have reciprocity all along the line between us and the Canadian border. But they do not wish to be singled out, and other large schedules left intact.

My friend the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HEDGE], who ably represents his district, in a speech during the last session enunciated a point that seemed to me to fit the entire case on the subject of reciprocity as far as the farmer is concerned. He said that in his district a petition was presented requesting him to support Canadian reciprocity. He found that it was chiefly signed by the implement manufacturers and dealers of the Tri-City Combination in the State of Iowa. He found there the plow manufacturer, the reaper manufacturer, the fanning-mill manufacturer, all signing this petition for Canadian reciprocity, in natural products. The gentleman from Iowa summed it all up in this statement: "I discovered," he said, "that the man who made the plow was endeavoring to reciprocate away the rights of the man who handled the plow." That seems to be the doctrine ever since the passage of the Dingley law. That law, imperfect though it was, was a good law, and one of the greatest ever passed by the Congress. However, the Republican platforms since then assert, that schedules should be altered to meet changed conditions, and certainly conditions have changed in the last eight or ten years.

Many previously small industries have during this period grown so large that they can compete with the entire world. Their schedules need revising. I do not wish to reduce the tariff by taking the duty off from hides and sole leather, the farmers' products, unless you take it off the manufactured article as well. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, I hear of no suggestion emanating from the leaders seeking to place the by-products of the Standard Oil Company upon the free list, and certainly the solicitude for Mr. Rockefeller's interests should not be greater than that of the American farmer. Again silence is the only response when allusion is made to the absolutely unnecessary tariff which surrounds the steel industry of the United States, an industry the greatest that he world has ever known, and which can and does produce and sell hundreds of millions of its finished products to residents of the Old World cheaper than to the American consumer. Certainly it can not be said that this all-powerful, world-supplying iron and steel corporation, which can and does accumulate the fortunes of a Carnegie, is in need of protection, and that the struggling infant industries of raising and manufacturing beets into sugar should be deprived of any protection, and compelled to come into competition with the cheapest labor on earth; that the forty or more millions now invested, not by a combination or trust, but by separate individuals, in one-third of the States of the Union be threatened with great damage and possible annihilation by the passage of this bill. The State of Massachusetts, which is a center of the boot and shoe manufactures and other finished products of leather, is clamoring for free hides, free raw material, the product of the farm, but still wish to retain governmental protection, full well knowing, as I believe, that they can successfully compete with all comers.

I wish to say that the farmer is the greatest and best wealth producer on earth, and yet he has no one, as it were, to speak for him. He has no tariff league behind him; he has no combination of capital to engage in his business. He starts out in the world independent and alone, and works industriously with his own hands. There is no combination that is here working for him, but you touch any of the tariff schedules of the great industries and you find at once springing up all around, combinations, backed by an organization that say, "Touch not," and they are not touched.

Mr. Chairman, in closing, I desire to say that the agriculturists of the great Western and Middle States are demanding a just and equitable revision of our tariff laws, and this demand is rapidly becoming more general, and to you, my Republican friends, who represent some of the larger manufacturing districts of this country, I say, in all seriousness, that you had better be wise in time and thus retain the friendship and cooperation of the best friend you have in this Republic—the American farmer. [Applause.]

Mr. DE ARMOND. Mr. Chairman, I thonght in the early stages of this debate that I would not ask the House to listen to me in the discussion; the debate has run, however, to such a length and has taken such wide range that, like many others, perhaps, I have been tempted to take part in it.

Some gentlemen have addressed themselves to the question, or have assumed to do so, as though a contest were to be waged between the free-trade party and the protection party. Some gentlemen especially who oppose this bill have talked about their opponents on this side of the aisle who are going to vote for it as representatives of the Democratic free-trade party desiring to strike down the policy of Republican protection. Whatever anyone may think about the relative merits of free trade and protection as principles, whatever anyone might do or might not do concerning them as original propositions, with a virgin country before him, with lines to be blazed and a policy to be adopted, it must be evident to everybody that now there is not in this country, and can not be in this country, any free-trade party. No party is trying to bring free trade.

We have embarked upon the policy of raising a large part of our revenue by resorting to tariff taxation. That policy has been pursued long years, with variations as to the incidental and sometimes as to the main purpose of the enactment. I am unaware that any person speaking for any party has proclaimed or will proclaim a purpose or a desire to depart from the gathering of revenue by virtue of tariff taxation. When a tariff is imposed upon any article the like of which is or may be produced here—no matter what the rate of duty, no matter what the mainspring that moves those who enact the law—it is and it must be in effect a "protective" tariff. If it be high, a high protective tariff; if low, a low protective tariff. If inordinately high, it may be even a prohibitive tariff.

Then may we not consider this pending bill, and the general subject of which it is a part, with reference to facts as facts are? Can it be necessary to assert—what is the temptation to make speeches and declamations upon the proposition—that there is upon this side of the Chamber a free-trade party trying to abolish tariff taxation? There is no proposition to substitute anything for it. There is no possibility on the one hand and no wish upon the other that anything be substituted for it. Then take it as a fact incontrovertible—a fact that the most casual observer, the most shallow thinker, ought to grasp and comprehend—that a large part of our revenues will be raised by tariff taxation; that whenever you impose a tariff of whatever degree upon anything the like of which is produced in this country or may be produced in this country, one of the inevitable effects of the imposition of that tariff tax will be what gentlemen call "protection." The real question at issue between the parties, the real question at issue between individuals and thinkers upon this subject, when they allow themselves to think upon it, is as to what the tariff tax shall be, not as to whether there shall be any; as to what shall be the purpose in imposing and maintaining a particular rate of tariff duty upon a particular article; what probably will come from it in revenue, and what probably, if you please, in what is called "protection."

Now, I think that everyone upon either side, whether voting for this bill or against it, everyone believing in a revision of the tariff and everyone in favor of the policy of "standing pat," as it has been elegantly phrased, must agree that we all start and all must start—unless we presume upon the ignorance of others and make a display of our own—upon the proposition that a large share of our revenues will continue to be gathered by tariff taxation, and that the tariff by means of which they are gathered will inevitably operate as "protection."

A large part of the people of this country, not confined to one party, one section, or one pursuit, believe that the tariff should be revised. There is another considerable group of individuals who affect to believe, not that the tariff ought not to be revised, not that it is what it should be, not that it is perfection beyond the possibility or hope of improvement, but strike out "who" and put in "that it is enough to" proclaim that they stand pat. They believe that for the present they can not be driven to revision, and their inclination and disposition, their hopes and their fears, repel the thought of consideration of the subject which so many others believe now challenges the consideration of every thoughtful man in all the broad domain of these United States of America. The statement of the proposition upon which the "stand-patter" places himself is a refutation, it seems to me, of all his claims. It is inconceivable that any tariff, made by anybody, at any time, in any country, for any purpose, could have inherent in it that degree of perfection that neither the lapse of time nor the development of industries, no change or diversification of pursuits, no inventions or growth, could bring about a state of things where some change would be desirable, much less a state of things where some change would be imperative, if justice is to be done to the people of the country.

If such a thing were possible as that there could be given now a tariff schedule, not fresh from the brain of the greatest men in this land or any land, but fresh from the throne on high, the sun would scarcely set behind the western hills and be lost to sight beyond the western ocean before some changes would have been wrought by the subtle, tremendous powers of the mighty agencies that operate in this country and this world, by means of which that bit of perfection of this morning would in some respects be imperfection this evening. And yet gentlemen tell us—no; they do not tell us, but they act as if they think we believe and as if they suppose the country would believe and act upon the assumption—that all the mighty changes of the years since the Dingley tariff law was enacted, all the great discoveries and inventions, the progress and the growth of a marvelous era, sending the United States and all the world forward with leaps and bounds—all this change everywhere, all this enlightenment and growth over the broad face of the earth—that all this has left one thing, and one thing alone, sacred, lofty, great, and perfect, beyond the touch of the finger of time, beyond the power of human intellect and patriotism and genious to bring a single improvement or a single amendment; the one thing, according to these gentlemen, against which the waves of time and all the play of circumstances, all the forces of nature, and all the development of man may be exercised in vain is this Dingley tariff law; a thing so perfect, not only at the time of its creation, but so perfectly adapted to all the changes and variations and vicissitudes of national and individual life, that while vast revolutions have swept over the earth and through the industries of men, this one thing remains so complete that the highest expression of statesmanship with regard to it is to "stand pat" upon it.

The very fact that certain gentlemen, or a large section of them, stand pat upon this tariff bill is the most severe arraignment of it, is the most tremendous condemnation of it, that it would be possible to find or to pronounce. Stand pat upon it, why? Because it needs no amendment, because there is no chance for a betterment, because in it or through it there is no partiality, no advantage, no disadvantage, no unlawful or unrighteous oppression, no unmerited hardship or suffering? Why, no; of course not; but because the gentlemen who assume to take that position dare not attempt revision. But it is imperative that statesmanship undertake and patriotism perform a reformation and revision of the tariff law. No one need talk of the virtues of protection or the vices of it; for, as I have said, here and now free trade is an idle, academic dream. I have no time for it, and I have no time for an abstract discussion of a live subject.

And what is the matter with your protection and your protective theory? Aye, what is the matter with the school of protectionists who dare not, although greatly in the majority in all the avenues in which and through which legislation must pass; with an overwhelming majority here and an overwhelming majority at the other end of the Capitol, and a most decided majority at the White House, what is the reason that these men, not foes to protection, not free traders, or, if you please, not falsely dubbed free traders—what is the reason that these advocates, promulgators, prophets, seers, and apologists of protection, as we have it, what is the reason that they can not, will not, do something, in the household of "its friends," with this subject of tariff revision?

Now, there is no answer to be made, in view of what has transpired and what is transpiring in this country; in view of the situation as it is, and as it has been; in view of the prospect that is before us—there is no answer except that they dare not revise, that they fear to do it. Why? Because A says: "If you interfere with the schedule in which I am interested, if you dare to lay unclean hands upon this holy schedule which has made me and my associates rich, no matter how many have been beggared, dare lay impious hands upon my schedule, you will have to prepare to meet my opposition." And immediately B, who is interested in another schedule, echoes the sentiment; and C and D and the others follow, clear through your protective alphabet. All this must suggest to those who are not blinded, those who are not wedded to names, those who believe in the rights of the American people—those plain people who are occasionally mentioned in speech and forgotten in action—that you are buying the favor of the monopolists and trifling with the interests and the rights of their victims.

Who can arraign the system, who can criticise the law, who can point out the dereliction from duty of the representatives of a great party, in terms more scathing than those which state the facts, or with more effect than that which the cold logic of the existing facts must produce?

The most defenseless man in these United States, so far as logic is concerned, so far as reason is involved—the man who stands in the position of the least strength and greatest danger, the man who places himself upon the shifting sands of the present, taking no heed of the waves and the winds which are threatening the foundations of things—is the "stand-patter." The day may not come soon, though I think it will, but the day certainly will come when those who, having the opportunity lack the disposition to do anything better than to label themselves "stand-patters," will have prepared, each for himself, an accusing epitaph which time with all its ravages never will rub out so long as a memory of them remains. [Loud Applause.]

In the Washington Post of yesterday morning I saw, and others of you saw no doubt, a very clever cartoon of the original "stand-patter," by that very clever artist, Mr. Berryman. I commend it to the consideration of the stand-patter of to-day, who, in full view of the robbery, answers the cry of monopoly's victim for help with the exclamation "What! While you have anyting left?" With a few touches put in, if anything could be added to it, let it be framed and hung up in every stand-patter sanctum. I suggest even placing it in the council chamber of the leaders of to-day in this House and in the other.

The cartoon represents an old man with his chair tilted against a shabby cabin with a hole in the roof, and when a neighbor asks him why he does not mend his roof, he exclaims: "What! When the sun is shining?" The sun has been shining long for you, my stand-patter friends. You have basked long in the sunshine. But in this world all is not sunshine. Occasionally clouds gather; sometimes the storm breaks; and if you will not repair your building in time, if you will not do something in the way of affording relief to an outraged people while the sun is shining, possibly a storm may come, a storm which may sweep you so far out that the resurrectionist will scarcely find you. Let me say that I am not trying to save you from yourselves; but you have the power to help the people by being just to them, and I would welcome good to them from any source. It is very evident though that a large share of our friends on the other side are so wrapped up in this Dingley bill, so dependent upon those who are interested in it, that they will enjoy while they can the sunshine, and will take chances upon the storms.

It was suggested by the last speaker, the gentleman from Minnesota, that the time may come when the farmers of this country may not rally to the support of the Republican party, as too many of them have done. Yes; that time may come. That time ought to come soon; that time will come soon if you persist in the policy which has forced upon the people of this country that attention to their own affairs which you in power ought to give and refuse to give.

The advantage which is given to the farmer is comparatively rare in this tariff legislation. It is true that the farmer is seldom legislated for in the fixing of tariff schedules. It is true that in the existing tariff schedules the farmer is given a gauze of words, the monopolist the valuable substance of things. As a matter of fact, they do not protect him, and never were intended to protect him. And yet somehow you gentlemen upon the other side have succeeded in enjoying too large a share of the votes of the farmers, to their own prejudice.

It was suggested also that there might be some consideration for the consumer. A new thought! An inspiration from the other side! Some consideration for the consumer, from the standpoint of a stand-patter! Why, the consideration is for the person who consumes the consumer. [Laughter and applause on the Democratic side.]

I do think there might be a little thought for the consumer. I really believe that this large and, I think, respectable, and surely neglected, class might come in pretty soon for a little consideration. Whether or not that consideration will be given soon, whether it will ever be given until there is a complete change of party control, of course I do not know. One way of giving consideration to the consumer with reference to this sugar matter would be to take off the differential duty upon sugar, to take off the extra duty upon refined and high-grade unrefined sugar, a duty that confessedly and notoriously is a sugar-trust duty. How strange it is that so much difficulty lies in the way of those who would remove the trust duty from sugar—that is, the differential duty; the extra duty from refined and high-grade unrefined sugar. The farmers would not be hurt by it. The consumer would clearly be benefited by it. The sugar trust would not be wronged, and it could be done so easily! Will it be done in this legislation? If I were to venture a prediction, based on experience and observation of the facts heretofore, I should have to say, "Hardly." Why? Let those who are opposed to the proposition answer. Let those who talk about looking after the interests of the farmer and the consumer and to the interests of the plain people of the land, a land glorious because of its plain people, let them answer for themselves and to their constituents, answer here and elsewhere, why it is that they will not join with us on this side to remove the differential sugar-trust duty from sugar.

There is impending right now, as we all know, something in the nature of a crisis in trade relations between this country and Germany, and there is an incidental advantage that we might derive from the removal of the differential duty now, an advantage without cost to us, an advantage purchased only at the price of doing justice to our own people and refusing longer to legislate and maintain legislation for the benefit of a mighty, soulless monopoly. Such legislation would remove in considerable part the friction and the difficulties now existing and increasing between Americans and Germans.

Why ought we not, in view of the provisions of the German tariff soon to be put into force and effect, and which threatens serious injury, if not disaster, to farming communities in this country in certain quarters and in certain lines—why ought we not, simply by taking the differential duty from sugar, open up, without cost or disadvantage to us, the way for larger importations from Germany of refined sugar, upon terms more satisfactory to the Germans, bringing, of course, in the train of such legislation terms more satisfactory to us as exporters, in our dealings with the German people? There may be a good reason, outside of the countingroom of the sugar trust, for continuing this differential sugar duty; but if so, I do not know what it is, and certainly I should be obliged for the enlightenment if some gentleman who knows of any good reason would tell us what it is. Nothing, it seems to me, but the tremendous power of monopoly, and the impotent dependence of a mighty party upon it, stands in the way to-day of the removal of this differential duty upon sugar. Its abolition would do away with many obstructions, not only to the prosecution of business with Germany upon as good terms as possible, but to an expansion of our export trade generally. It would be, in every way, to the manifest profit and advantage of the people of this country. Why not do it? Let those who are opposed to removing the differential sugar duty answer for themselves.

Mr. Chairman, I was very much impressed by the speech of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. McCall]. Like all of the speeches made by that gentleman—all to which I ever have listened, all which I ever have read—it was clear, calm, and dispassionate; full of thought, logical, and elegant in diction. There is in it also, it seems to me, the subtle spirit of prophecy; not the blatant prophecy which is employed in the place of argument and as an adornment of declamation, but that illuminating prophecy which comes from a comprehension of broad principles and an understanding of what probably is to be the result of the coordination of different forces in human affairs. He spoke of his great Commonwealth as having been "torn by force from the breast of her natural mother, which is the sea." True, Massachusetts has done well under this protective-tariff system, a system forced upon her, as we are told; a system which she to some extent would modify, so far as its grosser abuses are concerned, if those less wise and more intolerant, who belong to the same political party, would not obstruct and prevent.

Why may not Massachusetts again go to the breast of her natural mother, the sea? Why may not American shipping again whiten every ocean, and the American flag appear again upon American merchantmen at every port in the wide world, as before, when we had less protection and used more common sense? But the way proposed to bring Massachusetts and other parts of the Union to the breast of that natural mother, the sea, is not the old way; it is not the way of nature; not the way of reason. The suggestion is to pay the child for resorting to the breast of the mother. It is by means of a subsidy, we are told, that we are to rehabilitate the American merchant marine; not by removing obstacles, not by giving fair play, not by resorting to reason and profiting from experience, but by paying certain men to build certain ships and navigate them for their own purposes, and thus treat the people, about whom some now and then speak, but seldom act, as if the people and their interests could be left to the mercy of the monopolies you propose to build up. Assured of one thing, that whichever party prevails in this country, there will be a large amount of revenue raised by tariff taxation, and that the imposition of this tariff tax will operate as protection; assured of that, with no question about tearing down factories or about the smoke vanishing from factory chimneys, with no danger to industries, with no danger to trade or production, why is it that we may not set ourselves rationally, in the light of human experience, in the light of our own experience, in the light of the history of our own land, counseling in our own wisdom, warned by our own folly, why may we not legislate so as to put American shipping again upon the seas, with the American flag over it—without subsidies? Why not again as before, without subsidies, have the productions of this mighty land carried to foreign shores and products of foreign countries brought to this great land of ours in American ships, under the American flag, to the glory and profit of American citizens, instead of continuing the miserable policy which has prevailed for years and years? And yet the only cure, the only remedy, now offered by those in power is the miserable, dishonest, degraded, compromising, wronging subsidy—wringing money from the people to put into the Treasury, to take out and give to a few men to do that which, if you give all fair play and justice, would be done better without it.

I really believe it is high time, in this general era of good feeling, when partisanship does not run high and partisan bitterness seems to have gone, to consider great questions which essentially are not political at all, in a spirit of American patriotism and with regard to the rights and interests of the great American Republic and all its people.

Now, why not revise the tariff, bring it into such condition as your best judgment, not ours—the judgment of your wise men who dare think; the judgment of patriotic men who dare act—will suggest? The revision of the tariff under present conditions, with Congress constituted as it is, with the Executive of your own party, would not be a revision of the tariff by the Democrats. It would not be a revision of the tariff with which the Democrats could interfere, if you please. The question is whether you yourselves will revise it. That is the question.

Do not talk about Democratic free traders; do not talk about a free-trade Democratic party which does not exist. The question is, Will you do anything? It is not what we will do; it is not what we would wish to do; it is not what anyone but you would wish to do. It is not a matter of danger or of experiment into which alien and hostile hands will be thrust; it is a question of your will. What will you do?

Now, do you wish to do anything? Will you do anything? Take the matter of the rehabilitation of the American merchant marine. The question is, What will you do? Do you still wish to force the American who desires to invest his money in shipping to be employed in foreign trade, as he has for a generation been forced, to put that money into foreign ships sailed under foreign flags? If you do, continue your policy.

Do you wish to give Americans an opportunity to put money into American ships and sail them under the American flag, carrying our beautiful banner to the uttermost parts of the earth, and giving it to every breeze that blows over salt water, and have it appear in every port in the world? If so, do it yourselves; you have the power to do it. The way is open before you. Do not say there is partisan danger, for here you have a majority of a hundred and twelve, and your majority in the Senate is great. In each body the minority is equally impotent, so far as legislation is concerned. When you people control both Houses and have your own Executive in the White House, if there is not something done upon these subjects it is not because we obstruct, but because you will not act.

There is a good deal said about American opportunity in foreign countries. Every now and then gentlemen grow vociferous, and sometimes eloquent, in proclaminig their great desire to extend American commerce; to open better and wider and more numerous markets for the products of the farm and the factory and keep them open. It is a very popular theme, but how are you going to open those foreign markets? What is your process? Is it one of legislative hostility to all the nations of the earth? Trade is a peaceful pursuit. Trade is hardly ever carried on at the mouth of the cannon or near to the point of the bayonet. Trade is hardly ever stimulated by the roar of hostile cannon or the rattle of musketry, by charge of cavalry or steady tramp of deadly infantry. It is best when all that is far from the haunts and marts where trade moves and has its being.

The American manufacturer is invited, coddled, bribed, by the present system into hurtful dependence upon the home market, in which he is protected against rivals from abroad. You have said: "We give you this market for your own; exploit it and do the best you can. Prepare for the conquest; make the most out of those who are merely our helpless brethren." What is this but a temptation, an invitation, a bribe, to the manufacturer to produce his wares for the American market, and make what he can out of the American consumer? As to those wares which he sends abroad, that is incidental, is of small consequence; is a comparatively little thing. That is what you proclaim by what you do and what you refuse to do. The result is he does not manufacture in a way to compete as best he might with his rivals in other lands. When he goes to other shores, when he crosses the ocean or crosses the border line between our country and one adjoining us, he leaves behind this blessed, this sacred, this holy thing, the Dingley tariff law. There mutation and change and riot and chaos prevail because no Dingley tariff law is in force to bring order and enforce order, and to hasten, if not actually usher in, the millennium itself. There he must compete with the Englishman, the Frenchman, the German, the Italian, the Japanese, the Chinese, anybody, everybody under God's shining sun. In order to compete with them as fully and as successfully as possible, it is necessary that he center his attention upon the manufacture of such things in such a way, and pack, ship, and deliver them in such a way, as suits the particular requirements and prejudices, if you please, of the people with whom he deals. The German does it, the Englishman does it, and the Frenchman does it. Being merely an incident in our trade relations, being a little thing, comparatively, with this mighty American market all his own, where the buyers are handed over gagged and bound, with nothing left except the lining of their pockets, with that condition of things, the American manufacturer gives but little attention to the foreign market. Talk about extending our foreign trade! If you greatly extend that foreign trade you must make things and ship things and handle things according to the wants of the foreigners, studying their tastes and even their prejudices.

Will you give shipbuilders a chance, and by really protecting the people from the evils of monopoly protection inspire our manufacturers to systematically seek foreign markets? Upon the decision of these questions is going to depend very largely the issue of our efforts to expand and extend our trade in the far lands of the earth. If we are to continue on the plan of directing attention to the home market and pressing for legislation to enable the favored few to get more out of it, if the masses who are the sufferers by this policy are willing to submit indefinitely, then it is a matter of little difference, of little concern, to the monopolist whether we shall have much or little trade with other countries. But if by patriotic statesmanship, profiting by experience and looking into the future even so far only as the dimmest eye can pierce, we are guided by what, manifestly, reason and judgment suggest, we will set about so legislating that soon there will not only be a great American market in which the American manufacturer shall have the advantage over the manufacturers of every other part of the earth, but there shall be lying beyond it the wide expanses of earth, in all the lands where things may be sold, into every place where people have money to buy and wants to satisfy, the world's great markets, in which Americans may lead. The ingenious American manufacturer and the bold and unhampered American trader, if you will unhamper them, may go in prosperity beyond the dreams of avarice, distancing even the glowing colors of prediction.

Is it not time for us to get out of our swaddling clothes? Is it not time for us to assert our majority and cease all whining and puling as infants? Is it not time for us to arise in the majesty of the mightiest of peoples and be the mightiest nation under the best conditions ever known since the first recorded syllable of the history of mankind? This policy of proscription, this policy of repression, this policy of ministering to the rich and grinding the faces of the poor, can not make us greater, and if persisted in, instead of becoming greater and greater, we shall be stunted and dwarfed.

Have we reached the summit? Are we gazing now from our loftiest camping place upon the vast plain over which we have passed, and which is marked with the monuments of our progress? Are we upon the heights? Are we about to descend? Or are we upon the first elevation of American progress and glory? Are we to climb to still greater heights? Are we to view a broader expanse of the world of commerce, to peacefully invade all the nations, and by genius and enterprise win trade victories everywhere? Are we to be greater by being freer? Are we to be greater by being fairer? Are we to be greater by looking after the people, or are we to give ourselves over to mammon and have inscribed upon the tombstone of this great Republic, perhaps at no very distant day, the sad epitaph in which others may read of the rise and fall of another of the great republics of the world? There is no such thing possible as long continuing to be a free government, without fairness and justice to the masses of the people.

Free government and partiality by legislation—partiality for the few at the expense of the many—are things which can not be thought of at the same time, things which can not long coexist. A great people, with an inheritance of freedom, with promises and prospects such as have never before been spread out to greet the eyes of men, we have made marvelous progress, not in consequence of wrong but in spite of wrong. How much further we might have gone, how much higher we might be, how much greater might be the average of prosperity in this country, how much more complete might be the opportunity for all today, had we pursued a different policy, I can not answer and no man can answer. Fair distribution is more essential to national glory and perpetuity than vast accumulation ever can be.

Now is the fit time for doing what experience, justice, and patriotism admonish us to do. Now is the time and now is the opportunity, when the passions and the heat of prejudice and political excitement and political bitterness have well-nigh vanished, to set ourselves seriously and soberly and honestly to the solving of the great problems with which we are confronted. Will we do it? Upon this side we have not the power. It is for you gentlemen on the other side to act. You should be up and doing. You have an opportunity which comes seldom to a party or to the representatives of a party in a great National Congress. You have the opportunity to do what ought to be done, even from your own standpoint. Will you rise above the temptations that have enthralled you? Will you regard the interests of the American citizen, the plain American citizen, and change the laws, or will you depend upon the trusts by serving the trusts? I do not care to answer, though I think the indications are such that one might venture to answer without great danger of finding himself in error.

Now, the discussion of this particular bill is curious in some respects. Some of the proponents of this measure, some of the leading gentlemen on the other side, have explained carefully, diligently, with painstaking and much ingenuity and considerable invention, that this bill is no invasion of the sacred thing called "protection," for which their party stands. It is merely a measure of justice to the Filipinos, and not harmful to anybody here in the United States. As my friend from Missouri [Mr. CLARK] suggested in his most admirable speech, those who now cry aloud in oppositon to this measure, and whose voices and whose votes were for taking and holding the Philippines—they are seven or eight years behind time in making their fuss. They "stand pat" after the manner of the man who locked his stable, after and not before the horse was stolen.

I do not believe the passage of this bill is going to hurt the American sugar planter. If it does, why not let the Philippine Islands go? Why insist upon holding them? Why talk of not pulling down the flag or of having been sent over there by a beneficent Providence to hold the Philippines? Having seen the error of your ways, why not repent, make amends, and sin no more? If injury to your sugar interests be part of the price of your folly, why grumble? If you have to fulfill part of the obligation which you contracted, why not fulfill it like men? Why do you not say—in this human life how easy a thing it ought to be to say—"I was wrong?" Being wrong, take now the right course rather than stay out of it. Shake off the yoke of that petty tyrant, the consistency of vanity, which would hold you forever the slave of wrong because you began wrong.

These Filipinos are under the flag. They are subject to our domination, and by every principle of the Constitution, by every sense of fairness, by every aspiration of patriotism, by every mark of statesmanship, we are bound to give them what they are entitled to. If you are tired of your experiment, if you have enough of the dear little Brown Brother, if you really doubt whether he is a brother of yours, then let us provide in a decent way for turning the little Brown Brother loose to shift for himself, as he longs to do, first securing by international arrangement a guaranty against the aggression of other nations. [Loud applause.]

Great questions demand something of greatness in consideration and in solution. The greatest statesmanship is ever the wisest partisanship. The tariff is a great issue, and standing pat is meeting it as the ostrich meets the issue of hiding himself, when he buries his head in the desert sand. The restoration of the American merchant marine is a matter of tremendous importance, and the attempt to get ships by means of subsidies is like trying to make men rich by gifts of pilferings from the poor, instead of permitting them to gather the gold which willing industry would gladly labor for and win. The peaceful conquest by Americans of the world's markets is something to be hoped for and worked for, but it is not possible while the masses are given over in the home market for wholesale pillage by the classes.

Just in proportion as the masses at home recover their lost rights, the American manufacturer will turn to, prepare for, and succeed in the foreign market. That can not be won in sharp competition against formidable competitors which is not sought earnestly, persistently, intelligently. Justice to our own people will increase our trade abroad, to the great good of all. But "stand pat" will accomplish none of these desirable things. "Stand pat" is an obstruction in the highway of commerce. It would provide a shield for the oppressor, a weight upon the oppressed. "Stand pat" is the inertia of wrong.

If the Philippines be given free trade with the nation of which against their will we have made them a part, and if the sugar-trust differential duty on sugar be removed, then will Filipino and American be benefited legitimately, without wrong or partiality to anyone. Then a great deal would be accomplished. Then at last the Constitution, the old Constitution, the Constitution of the fathers, the Constitution reverenced by all men who have pride in this country or hope for its future, the Constitution which is the ark of our safety—then the great Constitution, in letter and in spirit, would be vindicated and observed. Hardship would not be inflicted upon anybody; complete justice would be done; and that justice would comprehend and include in its beneficence that oft-spoken-about but oft-forgotten element of our population, the plain, common people. [Prolonged applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. BENNET of New York. Mr. Chairman, I rise simply for the purpose of putting on the record some information which I think ought to be in the possession of the House in view of certain statements made by the gentleman from Utah on Friday last, and in view of certain inferences which he somewhat nebulously drew from those statements In substance he stated that the State of New York was not interested in the beet-sugar matter, and that the votes of her representatives would be influenced by that fact. Both the alleged fact and the inference meant to be drawn are incorrect. We do raise beet sugar in New York, and we are interested in the industry, and our votes are not going to be influenced by the fact of the existence of such an industry.

Mr. Chairman, the State of New York since 1897 has contributed more from the State funds to the promotion of the beet industry than have all the other States of the Union combined, the figures being for the seven years $404,913. And each year since 1897 the legislature has put upon the statute book this statement:

> This appropriation is made by the legislature in continuance of the policy adopted at the session of 1897, in the faith and with the declared purpose of making direct appropriations from the State for a successive period of not less than five years from said first appropriation, in aid of the permanent establishment of a beet-sugar industry in this State.

I propose to vote for this bill, not because we have the beet-sugar industry in the State of New York, for we have it; not because we have tobacco, for we have that, and not in spite of either of those facts, and not for any reason relating to either industry, but because I believe that there is a duty which only Congress can perform in relation to our helpless wards so far away across the Pacific. [Applause.]

Mr. RANDELL of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I do not deem it necessary to make any very extended remarks upon this bill, but desire to put myself on record in reference to its provisions, and to comment upon some of the issues that have been brought into this discussion. The act approved March 8, 1902, entitled "An act temporarily to provide revenue for the Philippine Islands, and for other purposes," levied a tariff on products of the Philippine Islands imported into the United States equal to 75 per cent of the Dingley rate. This bill proposes to amend section 2 of that act, placing all such imports from the Philippine Islands on the free list, except sugar and tobacco, and on these two articles it proposes to retain 25 per cent of the Dingley rates, which is one-third of the present tariff now levied on those articles.

This bill is presented by the majority of Committee on Ways and Means, the minority of that committee offering a substitute admitting all such imports free of duty.

In order properly to consider the issues involved here, we must understand the situation and the relationship between the United States and the Philippine Islands.

If the archipelago is a constituent part of the United States, it is clear that under our Constitution there can be no lawful tariff levied on its imports into this country, and we ought to support the substitute measure giving them free trade with us. If the party in power will not permit this, then we should support the bill, as it is more just and less obnoxious to the Constitution than the present law.

The Philippine Islands are far across the sea, 6,000 miles from our western coast. Its people are different from us—different in race, lineage, color, characteristics, and education, different in hopes and aspirations—with a future not to be naturally blended with ours. They inherited that country from their ancestors, and it has been their home as long as we have had America for our home, and longer than we have owned the greater portion of our country upon the American continent. They have hopes and aspirations, love of liberty and natural rights the same as other men and other peoples. They, like our forefathers, suffered by the hand of oppression, bound down four hundred years, subjects per force of the Spanish monarchy. They, like our forefathers, tired of oppression, fought for their freedom, and, in that fight which was waged for many years with varying success and much bloodshed, thousands and tens of thousands of lives were given for freedom, as our forefathers fought and died for freedom. And during all that time we sympathized with the Filipinos in their fight.

When by their own prowess they were about to accomplish as a fact that freedom which they craved, the Spanish-American war was declared. We made a common cause against Spain. We were allies. The result of that war brought the Philippine Islands into the hands of this Government and under the power of this Government. They who were our allies and our friends, who were supporting us in that war as we supported them, were, by the terms of our treaty with Spain, purchased by us for $20,000,000; or, as some have expressed it, for two dollars and a half a head. But possession of that country and dominion over it could not be obtained by mere purchase. It required force. The Filipino desired his liberty. He had been fighting for that for years, and continued that fight, and it is scarcely over to-day. The war there is over in name only; they are only partially subjected; they are still fighting fitfully for that liberty which is the birthright of every human being—still disputing the right of this country to control them. We have forced them into the attitude of being a part of this Government. Without their consent we have made them a part of the United States.

From that standpoint, Mr. Chairman, it seems to me that the dictates of conscience, common honesty, and respect for our own Constitution would impel us to give to these people the same rights that they would have if they had become a part of this country by their own will and our consent. [Applause.] Not only is it our duty to give them the rights they would have under our Constitution had they come to us by their own consent and our agreement, but the fact that we forced them into this position, it seems to me, only emphasizes our duty and appeals the more strongly to our justice and magnanimity. Therefore, under the Constitution, according to common sense and in fairness to these people, as long as they occupy the position that they are now forced to occupy by the arms of the United States and by the policy of the Republican party, managing the affairs of this Government at the present time, it is right that they should be accorded all the accruing benefits under the Constitution to which they are entitled as a part of this Government; and the tariff wall should be entirely torn down.

But there are some who oppose it; some men who claim to be Democrats who oppose it. There are many men who claim to be Democrats because they belong to the Democratic organization, affiliate with the Democratic party, but are really no more Democrats in policy and in principle than if they affiliated with the Republican party. Then there are men who are Democratic on some things and un-Democratic on others.

Without attempting to criticise anybody, I am here to say for one, as a member of the Democratic party and as a citizen representing the State of Texas in part in this House, that it is not the sentiment of our people, it is not Democracy in Texas to treat one part of this country in one way and another part in another way when it comes to the question of tariff. [Applause.]

We are a young and growing State; we have rice, we have sugar, we have tobacco, and they are the principal things that will be affected by this legislation; but, I tell you here and now, standing in my place as a Representative from Texas, that the people of Texas—yes, even regardless of party—are not in favor of discriminating against the Filipino for fear that he may interfere with our trade and progress. [Applause.]

If we can not raise rice in Texas at a profit we will stop raising it. But the fact is we can raise rice there at a tremendous profit. The only trouble is that the organization of trusts is so easy under Republican administration, under our tariff and transportation laws as they stand to-day, that the menace to the rice producers in Texas is from the trusts and not from the Filipinos; not from importation of rice into this country. The Philippine Islands are importers, not exporters, of rice.

So far as Texas is concerned, our interests are the same as those of the rest of the people. It is a part of the United States; it is a miniature United States in itself. It has every variety of climate, soil, and product that the United States is capable of; and every industrial interest in the United States appeals to us as personal, because we can build up the same industry in Texas if it does not already exist.

But the real question is, What is right by these people? One of my colleagues, a good friend of mine, has advocated the doctrine, astonishing to me—I do not know how it may appear to other Members of this House—that under the Constitution it is his duty to support the substitute, and, that failing, to oppose the bill; that to vote for the bill would be voting for a tariff which is unconstitutional—namely, the tariff on sugar and tobacco, the same being 25 per cent of the Dingley rate.

Mr. Chairman, if this were initiative legislation, if the question was whether or not we would have to put a tariff of 25 per cent of the Dingley rate upon sugar and tobacco imported from the Philippine Islands the product of those islands, I, like my colleague from Texas, would oppose the bill, because I believe we have no constitutional right to levy a tariff between the Philippine Islands and the United States, or any part of the United States. But this is not initiative legislation.

If the substitute is rejected, we must vote for or against the bill. A Member of this House that votes against the bill—if the substitute fails—votes to retain the present tariff of 75 per cent of the Dingley rate on all imports from the Philippines. Would not that be voting for a tariff? Suppose the Member refrained from voting and the bill were defeated. Would not that be permitting an unconstitutional tariff to remain on our statutes, when he had an opportunity to cast his vote for the abolition of nearly all of it, and to greatly reduce the remainder?

Now, how can a man be conscientiously impelled to vote for the substitute and yet conscientiously prevented from supporting the bill if the substitute is lost? When he votes against this bill he votes to retain, as I said, all the present tariff wall between this country and the Philippines. He votes to retain three times the tariff on sugar and tobacco that this bill provides, and yet he says his conscience will not permit him to vote for any tariff at all. The effect of the vote will be to maintain the tariff if he votes against the bill; the effect if he votes for the bill is to take away all the tariff except on sugar and on tobacco, and to take away two-thirds of the unconstitutional tariff on those articles. I will not take time to further discuss a proposition like that. The gentleman's position is that the Philippines are being robbed, but he will not vote to reduce the amount of the robbery for fear of making himself a party to it. I will not discuss this point further. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. CASSEL] says it will ruin the trade of this country if you allow the tobacco from the Philippines to come in.

I do not believe that we should consider primarily the question as to what effect it would have upon our trade. We should consider first the question as to what is right. But, if you will consider the question of policy and expediency, let us see: It seems that he is afraid of the Philippine product. The gentleman in his speech said there is a little over $2,000,000 worth of tobacco that is shipped from the Philippine Islands to all parts of the world. According to his statement, his district in Pennsylvania makes nearly $3,000,000 net profit to the producers of tobacco leaf. Following out his reasoning, his district will have more influence on the American market than all the Philippine export, and would be such a menace to the tobacco industry in the United States that we ought to put a tariff wall around that district in Pennsylvania to keep its tobacco from taking the market and ruining the producers of tobacco in other parts of the United States. [Applause on the Democratic side.] And a tariff wall around his district would be just as constitutional as a tariff wall between any other parts of the United States.

The fact of the matter is that we do not need prohibitive tariff walls around this country. It used to be the accepted doctrine that the condition of a people as to their civilization and advancement would largely be indicated by the amount of commerce in which they were engaged; but, it seems, in these latter days commerce is considered as a great evil. We must bar it out. We must adopt a system that will give a premium on things the production of which is less in this country than its consumption; and the same policy by the people of all other countries would necessarily lead to the result that everything consumed in each country would be produced there in the country where it was consumed, and there would be no need of commerce or trade whatever. The only commerce that would be possible under those circumstances would be a commerce with reference to those articles which could not be universally made.

But, my friends of the beet-sugar variety, when you protest against this bill remember that you are responsible for having the Filipinos as a part of this Government. If you made a mistake then, you ought to correct it now. If you did not make a mistake then, you have no right to complain now that they will be taken really as a part of this country. Why not get consistent? Why not join with the patriotic element of both parties of this country and give the Filipinos justice? Why not give them that liberty that they had won by the sword and have now lost by the overwhelming power of this Government. [Applause on the Democratic side.] You who are complaining about this matter, will you not come to the relief and help of those whose patriotic motives are to let America be a country of white men; a country of Caucasians—America to lead not only now but forever in the progress of human civilization? Come now, before it is too late, and help us to free ourselves from the entanglements of the Philippine Islands.

In this connection why not give to us what you have promised for these years? For the several years I have been a Member of this House I have waited patiently and hopefully, hearing your leaders say that while the Democratic party should have nothing to do with the revision of the tariff, yet that the great Republican party, managed by its great leaders, were speedily to give relief to the people of the United States by tariff revision, and that they, the friends of the tariff, would revise the tariff. Why do you not do it? We have waited long and patiently. Do you mean it? If not, why continue to deceive the people? If you mean it, why not act? Take up the question and revise the tariff. We live in a great section, where so many Members of this Hall reside—in the great Mississippi Valley of the United States—a farming country, where the farmer to-day controls; and I want to tell them and you now that the Republican party understands that the farmers of this country are getting to be a smaller factor every day and year; each election they are becoming a smaller factor in the policies and in the politics of the United States.

The policy of the Republican party is building up trusts by protective and prohibitive tariffs—trusts that are gaining more and more power, and spreading out their interests so that they combine many elements and interests. They take so much of the actual labor of the country into their ranks that the farmer is becoming less and less the powerful and controlling factor that he once was. It is time for you to realize this. It is time for you, the people, the farmers, all over the country, the great industrial classes that are not protected by legislation, that are not protected by any tariff, and that are not favored by any class legislation, to wake up on these propositions. Do justice in all things, separating yourselves from the Filipinos and from every foreign race. Break down the prohibitive tariff walls around this country, levy a reasonable tariff for revenue, fair to all the people, and depend upon it that our citizenship, the inventive genius of our people, the salubrious climate of these United States, the wonderful fertility of its soil, the destiny and the power of the Caucasian race, the Anglo-Saxon and the Teuton, will continue to move forward, not to a theoretical free trade, but to an untrameled trade; one that is fair and just, one where tariffs are levied for revenue, wisely levied with reference to the interests of all classes; and this country will be what our forefathers dreamed that it would be. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. TYNDALL. Mr. Chairman and members of the committee, I will promise not to detain you but a very few moments, for the question has been discussed long and very thoroughly, but I wanted to just merely give my views and express myself on the faith that is in me in regard to the subject under discussion.

Now, I remember, Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, some of the principles that we have stood by and for which the Republican party has fought for these many years, and I want to cite you one of the planks of our platform of 1896, in which we said we demned the Administration for not keeping faith with the producers of this country. They said:

> The Republican party favors such protection as will lead to the production on American soil of all the sugar which the American people use, and for which they pay other countries more than $100,000,000 annually.

That was in the platform of 1896. In the Republican National Campaign Book of 1900, Mr. Chairman, I read this clause:

> That (the Porto Rican) duty * * *—

Which you remember was a very small tariff; but it was an explicit declaration by the Republican party—> that it proposed to retain the power to fix such tariff as it might deem judicious against the products of cheap tropical labor wherever located and under whatever conditions.

In other words, gentlemen, it was a distinct promise to the farmers of this country that they need have no fear that the Republican party would not protect them against cheap labor and products of the tropical climes.

Now, the Philippine Islands, Mr. Chairman, contain an area of 73,000,000 acres, in round numbers. Now, more than 68,000,000 acres of that land is public—belongs to the Government. The population of the Philippine Islands is over seven and one-half millions, while that of Cuba is a little less than one and one-half millions. Hawaii has 200,000 population. The Philippine Islands have much more arable lands, much richer soil than have the Japanese islands, which support 48,000,000 of people. Now, the Japanese islands support this many people on a much less arable or productive soil than does the Philippine Islands support their population. That is the testimony given by Governor Taft before the Philippine Committee, on page 712. In the Philippine Islands there are 50,000,000 acres of land richer than the lands of either Hawaii or the United States. That is the testimony of Buencanimo before the Insular Committee, on page 445 of the hearings. The 800,000 acres of Philippine sugar estates would produce all the sugar which we import from foreign countries. Secretary Taft estimates that the Filipinos can produce, and that the islands are capable of producing, all the sugar we import from all countries from which we import any sugar. Mr. Moody asked this question of Mr. Taft:

> Mr. MOODY. Are the Philippine Islands in respect to soil and climate and labor conditions, capable of indefinite extension along the line of the production of sugar?
> Governor TAFT. Yes, sir.
> Mr. MOODY. Therefore, it is another place where the sugar of the world can be produced?
> Governor TAFT. I have no doubt there is enough land there, if the sugar were properly cultivated, to raise—well, I do not know how much Cuba can raise, but if conditions favor us—and he hesitated to use the word "we," Mr. Chairman, simply because I see all along through all of the data I have been able to get on this question that the Philippine Islands are held to be a ward of ours, and hence not, strictly speaking, a part of us in the same sense as are the different States in the United States of America.

Therefore, I unfortunately spoke of the Philippine Islands as "we," in speaking of the products and the conditions existing over there. He says:

> But if conditions favor us, we are going to be a great sugar-producing archipelago.

Mr. HITT asked him this question:

> It is said by experts on the Hawaiian and Philippine and Cuban lands that the Philippine lands are as good as the Cuban lands.

Governor Taft answered, "Yes, sir."

Now, Mr. Chairman, I know that we must take care of the Philippine Islands; that they are in a way a ward of ours. I have a word to say on that, and let me say that it is this: Our duty is to care for them and protect them as we have been doing there, but I do think we should do it from the Treasury or from taxes collected equally on all sections and industries of our country and not at the risk or hazard of any particular section or class of our people. It was only after the enactment of the Dingley law in 1897 that the beet-sugar industry began to develop. The beet-sugar industry practically had its conception or beginning since 1897, when the present tariff law was passed. When that law was passed, in 1897, there were but six beet-sugar factories in the United States, all located in California, Nebraska, and Utah. I believe there were a few in Utah. To-day there are fifty-four American beet-sugar factories, located in twelve different States, representing an investment of between $40,000,000 and $50,000,000.

At the time that the present tariff bill was passed the United States production of beet sugar amounted to only 40,000 tons. For the present season the beet-sugar production of the United States is estimated at over 300,000 tons, an increase of 645 per cent in eight years. The States supplying the fifty-four American beet-sugar factories are New York, Ohio, Michigan, Illinois, Wisconsin, Minnesota, Iowa, Kansas, Nebraska, Wyoming, Montana, Colorado, Utah, Idaho, Washington, Oregon, and California. In 1905 over a hundred thousand farmers of the above-named States supplied the factories with about 2,800,000 tons of beets, for which they received between fourteen and fifteen millions of dollars. Is it good business policy, Mr. Chairman, just after the moment that you see such success achieved, that you pass a law that would destroy this great industry we have built up, and which is just now marching, as it were, from infancy into manhood? To produce in the United States the sugar now imported from foreign countries would require the erection of 300 new plants at an expense of $120,000,000 for machinery and $60,000,000 for buildings, every dollar of which would be distributed and go into the hands of American workingmen and producers. To operate these factories in the product of the sugar that is now imported annually would require about 16,000,000 tons of beets, for which the American farmers would receive $80,000,000 annually.

Now, why stop such an industry as that? Why do we go and do that which would have a tendency or that would tend to retard the progress we have been making along this line. Ah, but they tell us it will not hurt this industry.

Now, I want to say, Mr. Chairman, that I am not from a State that is producing sugar beets nor engaged in that industry, but because we do not in my State produce them and are not engaged in this industry, I am opposed to anything that will injure the American farmer or any of those industries of the United States. I am not selfish enough to go off and say that because we do not produce this, because my State does not produce beets, that I should not care for this, which strikes directly the American farmers.

The only question here is this: The Philippine Islands are ours, and if they were thrust upon us as the result of war we must do the best we can for them, and we are doing that. We have given them liberty the like of which they never enjoyed before. Thousands and thousands of children in that sunny country are sent to school every morning at the sound of the gong. They are being cared for now. Do not let us sacrifice any industry or sacrifice our home people for those abroad. They are so far removed—7,000 miles away—surrounded by such a condition of circumstances there, and so easily accessible to the pauper, cheap, oriental labor, that it is hard for us to maintain restrictions on emigrants to that country and raise the standard of wages there. These people labor for 10 to 15 cents a day and board themselves. Boys can be employed for even 5 cents a day. With that condition of things existing there, Mr. Chairman, I do not think we can maintain the same standard of commerce and the same rules between these people as we can between the different States of these United States of America.

They are part of us, but not in the sense that we on this continent are part and parcel, bone and sinew of each other; therefore we can not maintain this system, Mr. Chairman, and from what I can gather and from what I have listened to and from the statistics I am satisfied that we make a mistake if we undertake to help them by destroying or crippling our industries here. Now, I believe in protection. I believe in a protective tariff. I believe in the Republican principle of protection. As was fittingly said the other day, I am not for protection because I am a Republican, but I am a Republican because I am in favor of a protective tariff.

That is what makes me a Republican; that is what has builded up our industries all over this country; that is what has elevated the farmer; that is what has sent the tall, gaunt form of poverty that stalked up and down this country from the Atlantic to the Pacific, from the Great Lakes to the hot waters of the Gulf; that is what has sent the tall, gaunt form of starvation beyond the borders of our country. You all remember how a few years ago men were hunting for work and the wages which they had a right to expect in return for work, but were turned away and could not get an honest day's work. The protective tariff is what has opened up the shops of the country, put the farmers to work, and given us these blessings that we now enjoy. Therefore I am in favor of maintaining this tariff between this country and other countries, and even between this country and the Philippine Islands, taking care of them in some other way than by destroying and ruining our own American industries. Let us encourage them in some other line, Mr. Chairman. We must have coffee, we must have many things in this country that we can not produce and that they can produce over there—the $84,000,000 worth of coffee that we annually bring to this country, the $49,000,000 worth of rubber and gutta-percha, which they can produce, the $15,000,000 of sisal grass, $8,500,000 worth of cocoa, $2,000,000 worth of cabinet woods, $2,000,000 worth of copra, $1,000,000 worth of indigo, and various other tropical products, which can be grown in that country. Let us encourage them along those lines. Let us not sacrifice our own resources here in order to give them encouragement and assistance. [Applause on the Republican side.]

[Here the hammer fell.]

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message in writing from the President of the United States was communicated to the House of Representatives by Mr. BARNES, one of his secretaries, who also informed the House of Representatives that the President had approved and signed bill of the following title.

On January 11, 1906:

H. R. 99. An act to aid the Council City and Solomon River Railroad Company.

PHILIPPINE TARIFF.

The committee resumed its session.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, I am opposed to the passage of this bill. It contemplates a heavy reduction of the import duties on sugar and tobacco produced in the Philippines now, and complete free trade with the islands in April, 1909. The friends of this bill say that if it becomes a law it will not affect the sugar and tobacco industries in this country. The burden of proof is upon the friends of the bill to show this. Realizing that the burden of proof lies with them, the advocates of this bill on our side of the House tell us that we shall not be harmed, because the tobacco grown in the Philippines is so vile that no American will ever use it. If this be true, then nothing need be done to encourage bringing it here. If it is true that the tobacco is such poor stuff that our people will not use it, then there is no occasion to pass this bill, so far as tobacco is concerned, because the Filipino will derive no benefit therefrom. But if, on the other hand, the lowering of the duty will bring this tobacco into this country, then every pound of it so imported may displace an equal amount of American tobacco. This means harm to the American tobacco grower, and places American labor and the American farmer on a level with cheap Filipino labor.

The friends of the bill say that no Philippine sugar is likely to come into this country—at least, no increased amount of it—because of the lowering of the duty, but that the sugar raised in the islands will find, as it always has, an oriental market. If this be true, then there is no occasion for the passage of the bill, because it will afford no relief to the Philippine sugar grower. He will still be selling his sugar in the markets of the Orient at their prices. But if it is not true, and the sugar is brought into this country, then it must come into our markets at a great advantage over any other sugar. There might be some excuse for so letting in this sugar if it would benefit our sugar consumer, but it will not benefit him. The sugar trust would simply have the opportunity to buy some thousands of tons of raw sugar at a reduced price and sell their refined product at the same old prices. Such has been our experience since we reduced the duty on Cuban raw sugar. It does not seem to be questioned on this floor that since we lowered the duty on Cuban raw sugar our sugar consumers have not obtained their sugar any cheaper, while, on the other hand, the Cuban sugar grower obtains but a small share of the benefit of the reduction in duty. The friends of the bill say to us that we are now paying $150,000,000 for imported sugar each year and why not buy from the Philippines instead of elsewhere. The answer is that we ought to discourage the buying of any sugar from abroad and encourage our own sugar industry, by a protective tariff, until we shall produce all our sugar. This is the true protective policy, that everything we can produce in sufficient quantities to materially supply our wants we shall protect by proper duties to the end that our people may supply our home market. It is an unquestioned fact that we have in this country the soil, climate, and facilities to produce all the sugar our people can use. Why shall we send abroad $150,000,000 each year for sugar? Why are not our farmers producing this sugar and putting into their pockets each year this vast sum? I want to see this done. I want to see our farmers grow this sugar. I am ready and anxious to do everything to aid and encourage them to do so. I am not willing to do anything that I believe, or even fear, will injure our sugar grower or in any degree postpone the time when he shall produce all the sugar we consume.

One of the great benefits of our protective policy is that it tends to diversify our industries. The increased production of sugar on our farms benefits every farmer in the country whether he is a sugar grower or not. Build up the industry of sugar growing, foster it, protect it, and in so doing you will benefit every farmer. The lowering of the duty on Philippine sugar can not help any farmer in this country. It will not give him cheaper sugar, and it may reduce the amount of sugar produced here. Why should we pursue a course that can not help our own people and may harm them? [Applause.]

No friend of this bill—at least no protectionist—admits that he would favor this bill if it will tend to harm our own people. So they belittle the bill and its effect. They make it a trivial matter by claiming that there is so little arable land in the Philippines that no appreciable amount of sugar, as compared with our capacity of consumption, can ever be raised there. Hours have been used on this floor, and elsewhere in committee hearings, and experts have been employed to prove that the Philippine Islands are nonproductive. The experts have testified on the question—many of them on both sides of it—and yet we who are here to vote on a measure involving the fact of the productive area of those islands are but little, if any, wiser upon that question. But, sir, if we must guess on a question vital in any degree to our interests, then let us guess on the safe side.

It is within the recollection of some of the older Members of this body when learned men, great statesmen, scientific and Government experts, published on this floor and to the world at large that we had no arable land beyond the Missouri River. It is easily within the recollection of the younger Members of this body when we were told by those supposed to know, and presumably having the means to know, that the great Canadian Northwest provinces were a cold, desolate, barren waste. To-day, hardly a generation since, we know that this great so-called "barren West and Northwest" is the granary of the world, so rich and fertile that it can and will feed the people of all the earth. It is idle, gentlemen, for you to even attempt to make the American sugar producer believe this tale of an unproductive country in the islands. He does not believe you, and, not believing, he takes no chances based upon such statements. However, seemingly, having little confidence in their ability to convince the American farmer and laborer that the passage of this bill will not harm them, the friends of this measure, with a benevolent smile upon their faces, say to the American farmer: "You owe a duty, a plain duty, to the Filipino. Providence has placed him in your keeping and you must not shrink from your duty." Gentlemen, the American farmer always has done his duty, done it when others failed, and he will continue to do it, I have no doubt, but I deny that he owes any such duty toward the Filipino as requires him to sacrifice either his property or his prosperity. He owes to the Filipino the opportunity to use his own, not ours. The American farmer and laborer did not take the Filipino under any promise, express or implied, or under any duty to give him free access to the American markets, the best markets in the world. We have been generous and fair in our treatment of the Filipino. We have given him for the first time in his history the chance to use his own. We have taken nothing from him and given him much. We collect a duty from him on his sugar and tobacco brought into our markets that we may protect our own, and give it back to him to use for his own benefit. This course of ours protects our own people and affords revenue to the Philippines. [Applause.]

The growing of sugar beets in this country is comparatively a new industry. Until the passage of the Dingley tariff bill there were but few sugar beets grown and but little money invested in beet-sugar factories. Under the beneficent influences of the Dingley law the sugar-beet production has increased almost eightfold. More than $40,000,000 is now invested in beet-sugar factories in the country, and new ones are rapidly being built. Thousands of farmers are engaged in raising sugar beets, and the number is rapidly increasing. More than 300,000 tons of beet sugar were produced in this country last year. We are spending millions of dollars in the West in vast irrigation projects, and a large part of the lands to be reclaimed by these projects are singularly adapted to the cultivation of the sugar beet. There has never been in our history an industry more worthy of protection than the sugar-beet industry. It is a peculiar industry, one that in its very nature needs protection. The sugar beet can not, like corn, wheat, and other agricultural products, be shipped long distances to be manufactured. It can not be stored in elevators, but must be converted into sugar almost immediately after it is grown and in the near vicinity of its production. This results in the erection of large and costly plants in small farming communities—plants costing hundreds of thousands of dollars each. They are entirely useless for any other business, and when not used as sugar factories can not be devoted to any other purpose. These peculiar conditions of the business make capital slow to invest in beet-sugar factories. Again, the factory can not go into the open market and get its raw material, but is dependent upon the neighboring farmer to supply the same. These facts make the business one in which the farmer is better able to protect his interests, because he deals directly with the consumer of his raw material. There are no commission men, middlemen, elevators, or vexing questions of freight rates to impede the farmer in marketing his product. Dealing directly with the factory owner, who is entirely dependent on the neighboring farmer for his raw material, it enables the farmer to obtain the best price for his crop; indeed, he knows in advance what price he can reckon upon. These conditions tend to make stability of prices for the farmer. It will readily be seen, therefore, that the factory must precede the raising of the beet. Capital is slow to invest in any uncertain venture, and so we say to the friends of this bill that the introduction of any more free raw sugar into this country, or the reduction of the duty on such sugars, tends to create doubt and uncertainty in the minds of the sugar-beet people and capital interested therein, so that the growth of the business will stop.

We can not afford to take the proposed step, gentlemen. There is no duty levied on a raw material that more directly affects the farmers' interest than the duty on raw sugar. Protect the farmer and laborer of the country and you protect every person and interest therein, for upon the prosperity and welfare of the farmer and laborer depends the welfare and prosperity of every other person in the community.

Mr. Chairman, I have not sought to go into figures and statistics in my remarks. Other gentlemen who have spoken on this proposed measure have used figures and statistics until we are dazed with the array. But whether one set of figures be more nearly correct than another is of comparatively little importance, since the fact remains that we shall consume a certain amount of sugar, more or less, and use a certain amount of tobacco, more or less, as the case may be, and we can and ought to produce all we consume of both products.

We should be paying to the American farmer the vast sum we pay abroad each year for these articles, and we should be paying American labor for manufacturing the sugar and tobacco out of the raw material grown by the American farmer. It is enough for me to know that every pound of sugar or tobacco we buy abroad ought to be produced in my own country, and I am in favor of every measure that will encourage and protect that production and against every measure that will discourage or hinder it. [Loud applause.]

Mr. KELIHER. Mr. Chairman, the poor Filipino merits the unmeasured thanks of the American people for being the cause of one of the most intelligent and instructive debates that have taken place in this body for years. Especially does he commend himself to the gratitude of the people of Massachusetts, who always did and always will take a keen interest in his welfare. Massachusetts is given a long-sought opportunity to deal over the shoulder of the unhappy Filipino a blow at existing tariff conditions that are working such havoc with her industries.

Her people have spoken upon the subject in no uncertain tones of late. They placed the sturdy manufacturer Douglas in the gubernatorial chair one year ago simply and solely because he embodied the movement for a revision of the tariff—particularly the abolition of the burdensome duty on hides. This year they gave the Republicans another shock by nearly retiring an exponent of "stand-patism," Eben Draper, who ran for lieutenant-governor, and they would have done so if he had not wisely recanted.

The Republican majorities that for years have consistently kept up in the sixty and seventy thousands have so dwindled that to-day Massachusetts is a doubtful State. Our people are keenly alive to the fact that they are being jollied when they ask tariff relief. They realize that the prayer of Massachusetts does not avail when the mandate of Pennsylvania is "stand pat." She is surfeited with idle promises and irritated by the appeal of the Republican leaders to wait till the friends of the tariff undertake its revision. She has been talked to in a kindly manner, but her pleas for relief have been answered in an unsatisfactory way.

Like the little girl in the song we sang in our boyhood days—

> Mother, may I go out to swim?
> Yes, my darling daughter;
> Hang your clothes on a hickory limb,
> But don't go near the water.

[Laughter and loud applause.]

So it is with Massachusetts. Her requests can hardly be said to be refused, but she gets—not what she wants—only the promise that some day in the hopeful future she is going to enjoy the sweet fulfillment of her wishes. During this debate much has been said upon the question of the hide schedule. Upon this phase, so vitally interesting to the people of Massachusetts, two distinguished members of this body, Messrs. KEIFER and GROSVENOR, of Ohio, held forth. Massachusetts was the object of their sarcasm, and her recent declarations through party platforms and at the polls in favor of tariff revision aroused their contempt.

They said nothing that could be construed as enlightening upon the subject. The ex-Speaker took ex-Governor Douglas of my State to task for having expressed some opinions upon the effect of the duty upon hides on the price of manufactured shoes. He appeared to enjoy himself, and certainly did nobody any harm.

General GROSVENOR, too, took a fling at Governor Douglas. The intent of his speech was to convince his listeners that Governor Douglas was grossly ignorant of the economic feature of the question. Naturally, when one hears from such "careful, thoughtful, profound" students of great public questions, their words carry weight, but I confess my unwillingness to believe that any intelligent, unbiased Member will pause to choose his authority as between either the ex-Speaker and General GROSVENOR and the largest manufacturer of fine shoes in the world—Governor William L. Douglas, of Massachusetts.

It is only just that we briefly examine into the respective qualifications of Messrs. KEIFER, GROSVENOR, and Douglas to pronounce expert opinion upon the mooted question of whether the price upon shoes would be affected by the removal of the duty upon hides. Mr. KEIFER's life has been a busy one. He has earned great honor and distinction on the battlefields and in the practice of law. For years he has given freely of his talents as trustee of a college, as president of a bank, as commander of the Ohio Department of the Grand Army, and for many years has been a shining light in this body.

His colleague from Ohio has been a busy and conspicuous figure in the politics of his State and country, all his time being absorbed by the multifarious duties such a position in public life imposes.

William L. Douglas is a product of a Massachusetts farm, who served his time in early life as an apprentice to a shoemaker, and has followed that trade ever since, rising by dint of perseverance and marked intelligence to the proud position of the largest and most successful manufacturer of high-class shoes in the world. If you want expert opinion on the effect of the tariff on hides upon the price of shoes, will you ask it of the soldier, bank president, the politician, or the man whose life has been spent at the bench and in the counting room of a preeminently successful shoe factory? [Applause.]

But if you are still in doubt, let us call up the utterance of one of the greatest statesmen the Republican party has produced in fifty years. James G. Blaine was a shining exponent of the theory of protection. His knowledge and experience and profound reasoning upon the subject made him the acknowledged leader of the movement in his time. What did this prince of protection say upon the question of taxing hides? When that other great and ever-to-be-loved statesman, William McKinley, was formulating his tariff bill in 1890, James G. Blaine, addressing Chairman McKinley, wrote, under date of April 10, 1890:

> It is a great mistake to take hides from the free list, where they have been for so many years. It will benefit the farmer by adding 5 to 8 per cent to the price of his children's shoes. It will yield a profit to the butcher—the last man that needs it. The movement is injudicious from beginning to end in every form and phase. Pray stop it before it sees the light. Such movements as these for protection will protect the Republican party into a speedy retirement.

This was the advice of Blaine, and the wise McKinley agreed with his reasoning, and hides remained on the free list. When Nelson W. Dingley undertook his task he, too, respected the prayer of Blaine and followed the example of his illustrious predecessor, McKinley. Notwithstanding this, we find hides upon the dutiable list. How did they get there? Rumor hath it that it was found, a squealing infant swathed in the richest clothing, carefully ensconced in an expensive basket, without a name, on the door of the Dingley tariff mansion. It was said that one Philip D. Armour, head of the great Armour packing house, had been seen in the neighborhood about that time. Suffice it to say that the foundling was taken into the house, fed, nurtured, and given the same care and protection that were accorded the legitimate Dingley tariff children. [Loud laughter.]

Massachusetts resents the charge that she asks and is not willing to give. She says as clearly and concisely as it is possible to declare a simple proposition, "Remove the duty from hides, and if you deem it fair and equitable take off also the duty on manufactured shoes." Is that not a fair proposition? Our shoe manufacturers go into Canada now and undersell the Canadian. Is it not fair to assume that with the reduction in the price of manufactured shoes that would follow the taking off the duty on hides that they would increase our market?

Our shoe manufacturers are not theorists, sentimentalists, nor politicians—they are keen, shrewd business men. They have studied this question from a business standpoint, and they declare if the duty on hides is removed they will take their chances with the so-called "pauper labor" of the world. They say, "If we must do so, let in foreign manufactured shoes duty free." To-day they are in the markets of the world, handicapped as they are, broadening their fields of trade and promise to make greater strides if this unjust tax is wiped out. But along comes the cry—the same old stereotyped wail—"Protect the farmer!" [Applause.]

The farmer and his hides. Why is it that a ripple of laughter invariably follows the coupling of the tiller of the soil with the business of selling hides? When the gentleman from New Jersey arose the other day and declared himself a farmer, and, further, that he had disposed of the hides of six steers, the membership present were surprised into silence, and his words fell upon a stillness one rarely enjoys in this Chamber. Why? Because the sight of an American farmer who sells hides is an exceedingly rare one. It is an indisputable fact that those great packers who are part and parcel of the beef trust buy the cattle alive, and that the percentage of distinct sales of hides by the small farmer is infinitesimal.

"Save the farmer." "Protect the farmer." If the men who stand opposed to the striking off of the duty on hides are sincerely solicitous for the welfare of the farmer, why don't they amend tariff conditions that permits the farmer of Europe—the competitors of the American farmer—to buy American manufactured farming implements in Europe cheaper than the American farmer can buy them in the home of their manufacture? It is purely buncombe, this cry of "Keep the duty on hides in the interest of the American farmer." 'Tis the packers' campaign contribution, not the farmer's welfare, that postpones the wiping off the duty on hides. My distinguished colleague [Mr. WEEKS] expresses considerable concern lest the American laborer be not protected. He asks if we would protect American labor. I answer, yes. I would protect it from the extortions that are practiced upon it as a result of the present tariff schedules.

I would protect the wage-earner's envelope, that is rapaciously eaten into by the exorbitant prices demanded for the necessities of life by the beef, sugar, coal, and other trusts that came into life, were nurtured, and now fatten off the protection of the Dingley schedules. Don't weep for the American laborer. He has abundantly proven his ability to care for himself. It is not the Dingley tariff that makes it possible for him to command a living wage, reasonable hours, and healthy environment—it is his demonstrated ability to organize, and through intelligent organization to obtain justice. [Loud applause.]

Massachusetts is restless at the inaction of her Representatives on the other side of the House. She wants action and wants it quickly. Words won't do. She is tired of hearing brilliant excomiums unon her patriotism, intelligence, and industry. Mere philippics cease to interest her. She is weary of listening to the bellicose threats of her Republican Representatives, who, with the belligerent strenuosity of their great leader in the White House, tear up and down our State on the eve of an election, declaring what is going to happen if their party does not offer relief, only to subside into docile party subserviency when the portals of Congress are crossed. [Applause.] What can they do? Charles Stewart Parnell organized his few Irish followers in the British House of Commons and paralyzed the business of that great legislative body till England listened to Ireland's story of her wrongs and took steps to relieve her unhappy condition. If the delegation from Massachusetts on the other side would but emulate the example of the great Irish statesman and bring into play their unquestioned influence, magnificent parliamentary equipment, and demonstrated familiarity with the rules of the House it would be but a short time before the obdurate few that stand between Massachusetts and her needs would capitulate. [Applause.] Nearly every other speaker on this great question, disclaiming powers of prophecy, has proceeded to record a prediction. I, too, am going to venture into the mystic fields of prophecy. Unless this Congress takes cognizance of the memorial of Massachusetts for the free raw materials her industrial prosperity demands, the State will swing into the Democratic column and many of the faces that stand forth in the picture of the other side will be missing in the next Congress, and if you would glance upon the features of their successors it will be necessary to gaze across the middle aisle into this section of the House. [Loud applause.]

There has been so much misrepresentation of the views of the effect of the duty on hides upon the cost of shoes that I append hereto a statement of the Hon. W. L. Douglas, late governor of Massachusetts, and the largest manufacturer of men's fine shoes in the world:

BROCKTON, January 14.

Ex-Governor William L. Douglas and what he has said on the tariff question were much discussed last week in the National House of Representatives. He has received many inquiries from Washington as well as from all sections of Massachusetts as to what is the "Massachusetts idea" of tariff reform, of which he seems to be the leader. Ex-Governor Douglas expressed himself as much amused at some of the statements attributed to him by Members of Congress in debate. He was made to say many things he never uttered, and was credited with statements regarding the manufacture of shoes that were not only untrue, but ridiculous. The ex-governor is still the champion of immediate tariff revision in the interest of Massachusetts industries.

Giving his reasons why the tariff should be revised, he quotes from his previous public utterances, saying: The three leading manufacturing States, with reference to products of manufactures per capita of population, according to the census of 1900, were Connecticut, Rhode Island, and Massachusetts. Each man, woman, and child of Massachusetts produced a manufactured product of $369 and an agricultural product of $15. Pennsylvania produced a manufactured product of $33. The total value of the agricultural products in Massachusetts in 1900 was but $42,298,274, while the total gross value of the manufactured products was $1,035,198,989.

Massachusetts, standing seventh in population and fourth in manufactures, sinks to the thirty-first place in agriculture, while the density of manufactured product per square mile reaches the sum of $125,000. The total gross value of the manufactured product per square mile in New York and Pennsylvania, respectively, was $45,000 and $40,000. We are not an agricultural State and can not look to this industry for the compensating relief which agriculture gives to those States where the manufacturing interest is not so well established. In density of manufactured product we have three times as much on every square mile as the great manufacturing States of Pennsylvania and New York. We may, therefore, justly claim that the revision of the tariff is of greater moment to every citizen of Massachusetts than it is to the citizens of any other State, excepting Rhode Island and Connecticut.

Massachusetts needs free hides, free sole leather, free coal, free lumber, free iron ore, and free wood pulp.

THE DUTY ON HIDES.

The hide duty adds about 7 cents per pair to the cost of producing the grade of shoes I manufacture. I also wish it made quite plain to the public that, while an increase of but 7 cents in the cost of manufacture of a pair of $3.50 shoes may seem a small and unimportant matter, that amount represents more than the net profit to the average manufacturer.

Of course, the duty on hides should come off. It is a tax on industry that benefits a very few people and injures everyone who wears boots and shoes, or who is engaged in the manufacture of leather or leather goods.

The total value of the hides of cattle imported into the United States for the twelve months ending June 30, 1905, was $14,949,628, while the total of all hides and skins, other than furs, exported for the same period was $1,051,641. We can produce only about three-fourths of the hides needed for the supply of our home manufacturers of leather, and must annually draw about one-fourth of our supply from abroad. A tariff tax of $2,500,000 upon this fourth results in an entirely unwarranted increase in the price of all sole leather used by American manufacturers.

To put $2,250,000 into the Treasury of the United States as the result of our duty upon hides, we put about $7,000,000 of unnecessary tariff profit in the hands of the beef and leather trusts. This puts an iniquitous tax upon the sole-leather industry of about $10,000,000 and disables that industry in its fight for the markets of the world.

The total value of the product of the shoe industry in Massachusetts for 1904 was $165,709,642, which is considerably more than half the total product of the country, which for the year 1905 is estimated at $313,000,000. The number of people employed in Massachusetts was 66,692, including men, women, and boys. The total amount of money paid for labor was $34,586,282, or an average of $9.97 per week, equaling $518.59 per year. With free hides, free sole leather, and free coal I believe the shoe manufacturers of Massachusetts could show an increase in their export trade equal to 25 per cent of the present product, which would be $41,427,410. That would necessitate 16,673 more employees, which would, on the basis of the cost of the product in 1904, entail the payment of $8,646,570 more to labor. The average labor cost of shoes produced in Massachusetts is about 21 per cent of the total cost. In my factories the labor cost is 27 per cent of the total cost.

LABOR COST.

As a manufacturer I ask for a revised tariff. I would gladly give up the duty of 25 per cent on shoes for free raw materials. I will go further than this and say that I would exchange the duty on shoes for free hides and free sole leather. If the handicap of taxed leather were taken away I could manufacture shoes as cheaply as any foreign manufacturer and could safely meet the competition of the world. We have the most approved mechanical appliances; we have the advantage of the economical division of labor, and our workmen are equal to any in the world. We are held back, however, by the high cost of the materials that enter into our product. This increased cost is not a natural cost. It is artificial and unjust. It benefits no worthy industry. It fosters gigantic combinations of capital, injures labor, and destroys foreign trade. Give our manufacturers free raw materials and they will carry Massachusetts goods into every market of the world.

Nor am I the only boot and shoe man who desires a change. In 1903, 311 out of 375 important boot and shoe manufacturers in New England offered to give up the duty on shoes for free hides. I do not believe that this sentiment has changed.

The sole leather I use in my $3.50 shoes costs 40 per cent more now than it did in 1897. Most of the leathers used in the top of the shoes has increased but 10 per cent. This great increase in the cost of sole leather demonstrates conclusively that the 15 per cent tariff on hides and the 20 per cent duty on finished sole leather is responsible for the advance, as the duty on hides has produced a shortage of the supply to such an extent that sole leather is a great deal higher than it should be if we only had to pay for sole leather just what the 15 per cent duty on hides adds to the normal cost.

Manufacturers have been able to overcome this great increase in cost of raw materials by the improvement in machinery, change of method in manufacture, and by doing a larger volume of business at a lower percentage of profit. But now we have reached our limit. All the advantages that should naturally have been reaped by the wearer of shoes has been consumed by the increased cost of materials. To-day shoe manufacturers can not reduce the cost of labor or the cost of materials, and they can not take a smaller profit and remain in business. We must secure relief by the repeal of the duty on hides and the duty on shoe leather. Failing in this, we must either increase the price of shoes or make them of less value for money now paid by the wearer.

The export trade in shoes is very small, amounting last year to about $8,000,000. Nearly this amount of business is transacted by the Douglas concern alone. It would therefore appear that the foreign field is not to any great extent available to American shoe manufacturers, owing to the fact that they must meet the competition of manufacturers on the other side who do not pay the tariff taxes levied on the industry in this country.

Speaking of reciprocity with Canada—if we could sell our shoes in the Dominion free of duty, from my experience with the trade I have had there—I could easily add another factory to the three large factories my company now has under operation, which would employ certainly 1,000 men and women with a pay roll of about $750,000 a year, the average pay in the Douglas factories being considerably more than the average of the State as a whole. If, even having reciprocity with Canada alone I could establish that, how much more could I accomplish if I and my fellow shoe manufacturers could have reciprocity with all nations of the world, which we are entitled to; and what is true of the shoe business would be equally true of all other manufactures in the Commonwealth.

Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The Chair will state that several gentlemen who had expressed a desire to speak to-day have withdrawn their requests. Every gentleman who has expressed a desire to do so has now spoken except the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BOUTELL], a member of the Ways and Means Committee, whom the Chair thinks proper to recognize to conclude the debate. Before doing so the Chair will ask if any gentleman opposed to the bill desires now to be heard? No gentleman desiring to be heard, the gentleman from Illinois is recognized.

Mr. BOUTELL. Mr. Chairman, this discussion has now proceeded without limitation until every Member of the House who desired to do so has had an opportunity to submit his views upon the question under consideration. The arguments for and against this measure have been presented with unusual vigor, but at the same time with uniform candor and good feeling and with far less exaggeration than often characterizes an important debate. The speeches have been all full of interest and information. The Members of the House who had the good fortune to go to the Orient with the Secretary of War who have addressed the committee have placed not only us who had the pleasure of listening to them, but the whole country under a distinct debt of gratitude to them for the thoroughness with which they made their investigation and for the painstaking manner in which they presented their conclusions to the committee. We are now in possession of all the available facts bearing upon the pending question. It might seem that nothing remains except for us to vote upon the proposition before us.

It occurred to me, however, Mr. Chairman, that it might aid us in coming to just conclusions on this very important measure if we should endeavor now to resolve ourselves, as it were, into a judicial frame of mind and to attempt to marshal before us the facts and arguments that have been so ably and exhaustively presented and to give to each one its proper proportion and its due weight. For this purpose alone, Mr. Chairman, I venture to indulge at this late hour upon the patience of the committee. The debate upon this measure has discovered plainly the enemies of the proposed legislation and the strength and character of their opposition. They are ranged in two camps, whose heaviest artillery, however, is directed against each other. Those on the right flank are fighting this measure because, as they assert, there is too much free trade in it, while those on the left flank are fighting it in its present form not less fiercely on the ground that there is too much protection in it. Those who occupy the former camp are Republicans who believe that the time-honored protective principles of the Republican party are being violated by this bill and by some Democrats who assert that the time-honored protective policy of the Democratic party is being profaned by this measure; while those in the other camp are exclusively Democrats who believe that the time-honored free-trade principle, the constitutional free-trade principle of the great historic and only consistent free-trade party, is being desecrated and polluted.

Any attempt, therefore, Mr. Chairman, to make this measure conform to the views of either camp of opponents would simply render more energetic the opposition of the other camp. They are apparently fundamentally irreconcilable. The leaders, however, on the left assure us that they and their followers, if they shall not be able to amend this bill to conform with their views, will accept it as it is, giving as their reason for this course that they believe that it contains less of the virus of protection than the legislation which is now in force. This, Mr. Chairman, seems to be the strategic situation. The objections that have been so vigorously made to this measure are neither trivial nor captious, but are rather of such a character as to command most accurate analysis and open-minded unprejudiced consideration. Let us then at the outset, Mr. Chairman, recall the exact status of the laws that now govern the commercial intercourse between the United States and the Philippine Islands, which this bill seeks in some way to modify. In the first place, when we emerged from chaos resulting from the war with Spain, we passed on the 8th of March, 1902, an act entitled "An act temporarily to provide revenues for the Philippine Islands, and for other purposes." This act, which is now in force, provides that goods coming into the United States from the Philippine Islands, if they are wholly the growth and product of those islands, shall pay 75 per cent of the Dingley rate. All other goods coming to the United States by way of the Philippine Islands pay, of course, the full Dingley duty. On the 3d of March, 1905, we passed a Philippine tariff bill to take the place of the Philippine tariff legislation provided by the Insular Commission.

This act provides for duties on goods coming into the Philippine Islands from all the world, including the United States, and I wish to call special attention, Mr. Chairman, to the fact that this act of March 3, 1905, provides for certain export duties, especially on hemp, indigo, cocoa, sugar, and tobacco. Now, then, in what respect does the present bill modify existing law? The measure which we are now considering is as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the second section of the act entitled "An act temporarily to provide revenue for the Philippine Islands, and for other purposes," approved March 8, 1902, is hereby amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 2. That on and after the passage of this act there shall be levied, collected, and paid upon all articles coming into the United States from the Philippine Islands the rates of duty which are required to be levied, collected, and paid upon like articles imported from foreign countries: Provided, That all articles wholly the growth and product of the Philippine Islands coming into the United States from the Philippine Islands shall hereafter be admitted free of duty, except sugar and tobacco, manufactured and unmanufactured, upon which there shall be levied, collected, and paid only 25 per centum of the rates of duty aforesaid: And provided further, That the rates of duty which are required hereby to be levied, collected, and paid upon products of the Philippine Islands coming into the United States shall be less any duty or taxes levied, collected, and paid thereon upon the shipment thereof from the Philippine Islands, as provided by the act of the United States Philippine Commission referred to in section 1 of this act, under such rules and regulations as the Secretary of the Treasury may prescribe; but all articles the growth and product of the Philippine Islands admitted into the ports of the United States free of duty under the the provisions of this act, and coming directly from said islands to the United States for use and consumption therein, shall be hereafter exempt from any export duties imposed in the Philippine Islands: Provided, however, That in consideration of the rates of duty aforesaid, all articles wholly the growth and product of the United States, going into the Philippine Islands, shall hereafter be admitted free of duty, except sugar and tobacco, manufactured and unmanufactured, upon which no higher rate of duty shall be levied, collected, and paid than is laid upon articles of like character coming from the Philippine Islands into the United States:

"And provided further, That on and after the 11th day of April, 1909, all articles and merchandise going from the United States into the Philippine Islands, and all articles wholly the growth and product of the Philippine Islands coming into the United States from the Philippine Islands shall be admitted free of duty: And provided further, That in addition to said duty when levied and in case said articles are admitted into the United States free of duty, there shall be paid upon articles of merchandise of Philippine Islands manufacture coming into the United States and withdrawn for consumption or sale a tax equal to the internal-revenue tax imposed in the United States upon the like articles of merchandise of domestic manufacture; such tax to be paid by internal-revenue stamp or stamps to be purchased and provided by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue and to be procured from the collector of internal revenue at or most convenient to the port of entry of said merchandise in the United States, and to be affixed under such regulations as the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, shall prescribe, and such articles of Philippine Islands manufacture mentioned in this proviso shall be exempt from payment of any tax imposed by the internal-revenue laws of the Philippine Islands: And provided further, That in addition to the duty hereinbefore provided when levied and in case said articles are admitted into the Philippine Islands free of duty, there shall be paid upon articles of merchandise manufactured in the United States and going into the Philippine Islands and withdrawn for consumption or sale, a tax equal to the internal-revenue tax imposed in the Philippine Islands upon the like articles of merchandise when manufactured in the Philippine Islands; such tax to be paid by internal-revenue stamps or otherwise as provided by the laws in force in the Philippine Islands upon the like articles; and such articles manufactured in the United States mentioned in this proviso and going into the Philippine Islands shall be exempt from payment of any tax imposed by the internal-revenue laws of the United States. All the moneys collected under this section as amended shall be paid over and disposed of as provided in section 4 of the act hereby amended, and shall not be covered into the Treasury of the United States."

As will be seen, it contains four principal features: First, that all goods wholly the growth of the Philippine Islands coming into the United States shall be admitted free except sugar and tobacco, which shall pay 25 per cent of the Dingley rate; and that all other goods coming by way of the Philippine Islands shall, of course, pay the full Dingley rates. Second, that sugar and tobacco in their various forms going from the United States shall be admitted into the Philippines free of duty. Third, that these provisions are to remain in force until April 11, 1909, when there is to be free interchange of all commodities between the United States and the archipelago. Fourth, that goods that were imported into the United States and held in bond and withdrawn after the passage of this bill shall pay the rates that were in force when the goods were brought in.

Now, stated in their broadest terms, the reasons for the passage of this bill are these:

First, we believe it is approved by the great majority of the people in the United States;

Second, it will prove of mutual benefit to the people of the Philippine Islands and the United States in their commercial intercourse with each other; and Third, we know that the passage of this bill is earnestly desired by all intelligent Filipinos.

Now, Mr. Chairman, let us direct our attention to the objections that have been made to this measure, and at the outset let us consider our sources of knowledge respecting the present situation. We have, first, the report of the officers of the United States who have been in the Philippine Islands, including the reports of the Philippine Commission. We have the testimony of witnesses taken at various times and before various bodies, including the testimony taken for and against this bill by the Ways and Means Committee during the early days of this session.

Now, we have noticed, Mr. Chairman, that in discussing some of this evidence various and contradictory conclusions have been drawn. The variety of conclusions that have been drawn from some of the public testimony reminds me very much of the traditional versatility of Dean Swift in finding texts for his wonderful discourses suitable for all occasions. Tradition has it that at one time he informed a party of wits with whom he was spending the evening that on the following Sunday he proposed to preach a sermon against the extravagant headdresses of the women which were the prevailing fashion at that time. One of his friends laid a wager that he would not be able to find any appropriate text in the scriptures for such a sermon. The versatile Dean accepted the wager, and on the following Sunday the church was crowded to hear his discourse. He announced his text from the twenty-fourth chapter of St. Matthew, in these words:

And let him that is on the house top not come down.

And, said the wily Dean:

I invite the attention of the ladies especially to that clause of the phrase which says "top not come down."

[Laughter.]

Now, if I were going to sermonize on this occasion and were to adopt a text relating to any of the testimony that has been adduced for and against the bill, I should be inclined to direct the sermon against the highly exaggerated testimony of some of the witnesses, and I would shorten up even the text of the Dean and confine it solely to two words, namely, "Come down." [Laughter.]

But, Mr. Chairman, just as this irreverent usage of the scriptures was unbecoming the sacred office of this distinguished ecclesiastic, so it seems to me it ill comports with the dignity and character of this House and the traditions of this Chamber to take testimony before us and use it in a scrappy, disjointed, illogical, and unfair manner for the purpose of maintaining any contention. We all know that opinions that were formed by those who visited the Philippine Islands in 1898 were changed by them in 1902, and many of them had reason to change their views again before 1906. And so, in examining this evidence, and in taking the reports of our officers, we should make all due allowances for changes that have taken place in the opinions of men due to entirely new discoveries.

Now, then, let me call your attention to the views that come from the camp on the left, from those who maintain that this bill should provide at once for free trade between the islands and the United States, and who base this contention very largely upon what they claim to be constitutional grounds. The gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS], whom I regret to see is not here to-day, the undaunted leader of a reduced but undismayed minority, and his very spirited lieutenant, the Prince Rupert of the legions of free trade [laughter], the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CLARK], in opposing the bill in its present form have reverted to the arguments that were made in this House seven or eight years ago on questions relating to the acquisition and control of new territory by the United States. How well do we recall here this afternoon, those of us who were in the Fifty-fifth Congress, the rush of events, as we were constantly confronted with propositions which were unfamiliar to the present generation of statesmen. When we began to discuss the question of how we should treat Porto Rico and the Philippine Islands, I remember very distinctly an eminent leader on the other side of the Chamber saying in debate: "Every man who has read the Constitution knows that it provides that all our Territories shall have a Delegate in the National Congress."

It goes without saying that when he himself, at the suggestion of one of his colleagues, had read the Constitution in the quiet hours of the evening that that part of his speech was dropped when it appeared in permanent form. The problems were new and we had forgotten history. We were rushing to the library for atlases and maps to find out where the Philippine Islands were and how to spell Manila and what the products of the islands were and what the form of government. I remember very well in the closing days of the Fifty-fifth Congress sitting by one of my colleagues who was a distinguished Republican anti-imperialist, when an equally distinguished Democratic anti-imperialist came over and sat beside him and said: "Tell me, are these 'Philippians' the same chaps that St. Paul wrote the epistle to?" [Laughter.] And the Republican said, "Yes, I think they are the same." [Renewed laughter.] And the Democrat said, "I thought so;" and I remember that he wrote to those fellows to work out their own salvation [renewed laughter], with fear and trembling [laughter], and I think that is a pretty good reason for leaving them alone. [Renewed laughter.]

So with these new problems and with considerable confusion of ideas in reference to the territory itself and to the principles which we should apply in governing them, the minority, who were not responsible for the government of these islands, opposed the Republican policy because, as they claimed, any territory that was acquired by the United States, whether by war or by cession or by treaty, passed automatically under the Constitution, and the inhabitants of those territories automatically received all the rights and privileges that were possessed by the inhabitants of the States within the Union. So the Republicans, who were called upon to make legislation and pass laws for those islands, reverting to history, found that in the acquisition of territory in 1803 and 1819, and again after the war with Mexico, and in the Gadsden purchase, Congress had always maintained the right to legislate for these newly acquired territories, free from restrictions applicable to the States themselves. So the Republicans have always maintained that in legislating for Porto Rico and for the Philippines Congress has full plenary powers, and may establish free trade or a tariff, as we deem wise and best for all parties in interest. I want to call attention here to that clause in the Constitution which gives us that power. It is found in the second paragraph of section 3 of Article IV of the Constitution:

> The Congress shall have power to dispose of and make all needful rules and regulations respecting territory or other property belonging to the United States.

So we proceeded to legislate upon that basis. The Supreme Court, in the various cases that came before it, approved of that policy, and the elections that have taken place since 1898—the Congressional and the Presidential elections—have shown that the people of the United States approved of that as a national policy. So to-day, instead of our being under the necessity, as claimed by the gentleman from Mississippi, of giving to these islands free trade, we reserve the right to so legislate for those islands from time to time, and temporarily it may be, for the best interest of all parties concerned.

Now, that being so, the Republicans, who are responsible for the management of this territory, at the present time are called upon to provide revenue for carrying on the government of the Philippine Islands, and the necessity for this revenue is the reason for levying in the present bill a 25 per cent proportion of the Dingley duties on sugar and tobacco coming into this country.

Now, it has been asked why we can not give free trade at once from an economic standpoint. Simply for this reason, and we should keep it clearly in mind, that the United States is now endeavoring to provide a suitable system of internal taxation for raising sufficient revenue for these islands, and we are making good progress.

During the last fiscal year the total revenues from these islands, insular and provincial, amounted to $17,500,000, against the average amount under the Spanish régime of something like $13,500,000 a year.

As to the necessity of changing the revenue system and providing new sources of income, and as showing the changes which were needed in the Philippine Islands, let me call your attention to a few paragraphs in the first report of the Philippine Commission, published in Volume I, 1900, on page 81:

> The scheme of government instituted by Spain for the Philippines was in itself far from perfect, and in its practical operations it was open to the gravest objections. It failed to accomplish even the primary ends of good government—the maintenance of peace and order and the even administration of justice; nor can there be any doubt that it proved an engine of oppression and exploitation of the Filipinos. It took their substance in the form of taxes and contributions and gave no equivalent in return. The preceding sections have shown the use made of the public moneys, which was in general an unproductive one. The people paid heavy taxes and were subject to annoying and vexatious restrictions on their rights; yet the country was not developed, roads were not made, popular education was not established. It almost seemed as though the great trust of government had been perverted into a mere instrument for the benefit of the governing class at the expense of their subjects. The revenues were swallowed up by salaries, most of which seemed unnecessary. The very category of public works is only another designation for salaries. There were in reality no public works. The revenues of the archipelago were exhausted by unproductive expenditures on naval and military establishments, on salaries and pensions, on the church, and on the colonial office in Madrid. And the people governed had no redress, as they had no control or voice in the matter.
> The most prominent defects in this scheme of government were: (1) The boundless and autocratic powers of the governor-general; (2) the centralization of all governmental functions in Manila; (3) the absence of representative institutions in which the Filipinos might make their needs and desires known; (4) a pernicious system of taxation; (5) a plethora of officials who lived on the country and by their very numbers obstructed, like a circumlocution office, the public business they professed to transact; (6) division of minor responsibilities through the establishment of rival boards and offices; (7) the costliness of the system and the corruption it bred; and (8) confusion between the functions of the state and the functions of the church and of the religious orders.
> If these abuses are remedied, if a capable and honest government is instituted, if the Filipinos are permitted to the full extent of their ability to participate in it, if all unnecessary offices are abolished, if church is separated from state, if the public revenues are used solely to defray the legitimate expenses of the government and the cost of duly authorized public works and improvements, including the beginnings of a system of elementary schools—if, in a word, government is administered in the Philippines in the spirit in which it is administered in the United States, the people of that archipelago will, as already a few of them foresee, enjoy more benefits than they dreamed of when they took up arms against the corrupt and oppressive domination of Spain.

And after the lapse of five years, Mr. Chairman, we may congratulate ourselves that all or most of these abuses have been corrected. One of the principal things which has been accomplished has been the doing away with the old system of taxation by which the revenues contributed by the people went into the pockets of the taxgatherers and not for the benefit of the community. Under our régime taxes have been honestly collected, the revenues have been largely increased, roads have been built, the cities have been cleansed, schools have been established, and the people already have begun to enjoy the benefits which are referred to in this report.

But, Mr. Chairman, there can be no such thing as a state without revenue. The government can not be carried on without resources, and in our efforts to lead the Filipinos up to the position of independence it has seemed wise to us who are responsible for this government that the revenues of the Filipinos should come from some established system of taxation and not as charity from the American people.

This is the reason, Mr. Chairman, for leaving 25 per cent duty on the sugar and tobacco coming into the United States and for not granting free trade until after the expiration of the concession given by us in the treaty to Spain. Now, as showing further the benefits that have already accrued in a most striking form under our administration of the archipelago, I would like to insert here an editorial from the Chicago Tribune, entitled "Railways in the Philippine Islands."

RAILWAYS IN THE PHILIPPINES.

One of the chief needs—perhaps the chief need—of the Philippine Islands is adequate means of transportation. The people can not be prosperous until they can get their productions to market. They can not do that without roads, railways, ships. The Philippine government is making the best speed it can to provide these essentials for the people's material well-being and advancement. It has effected great betterments in the roads, which were in an extremely sorry condition at the close of the period of insurrection. Legislation has been enacted for the improvement of interisland shipping, and Colonel Edwards, of the bureau of insular affairs, believes it is a matter of but a short time until there will be a satisfactory system of railways.

Almost thirty years ago Mr. Navarro, a Spanish engineer in the department of public works at Manila, got up a plan for a system of railways on the island of Luzon. The Spanish Government advertised three times for bids before it finally in 1886 got an offer from an English company for the construction of one of the proposed lines, that from Manila to Dagupan, approximately 221 miles in length. The Government guaranteed an income of 8 per cent on $5,353,700, the cost of building the line, for ninety-nine years. Since American occupation the company owning this road has been granted concessions for extending it about 108 miles.

The Cooper bill authorized the government of the Philippine Islands to assume a contingent liability of $1,200,000 a year for a period of thirty years to encourage the building of railways. Under this act Secretary Taft advertised for bids for the construction, equipment, maintenance, and operation of lines aggregating 1,233 miles in length. The 800 miles on the island of Luzon are to be built practically according to the original plans of Mr. Navarro. The rest of the system will be on the Visayan Islands and on Panay, Negros, Cebu, Leyte, and Samar. Our Government had better success in getting offers than that of Spain. Spain guaranteed an income from the roads of 8 per cent for ninety-nine years and advertised three times before a single bid was received. The United States offers to guarantee a maximum of 4 per cent for thirty years. When the bids were opened at Washington on December 15 last it was found that one bidder proposed to build 425 miles on Luzon at the rate of 75 miles a year without any guarantee of interest by the government. Another offered to construct 290 miles on Panay, Negros, and Cebu. The latter asked a guarantee of 4 per cent on 95 per cent of the cost of construction.

The responses received on this occasion will doubtless encourage the government to advertise for bids again at an early date. They tend to justify Colonel Edwards's optimistic prediction that it will not be long before the Philippines will have railways covering all routes where they can be made profitable. The railway is destined to play a leading part not only in the industrial development, but in the civilization of the islands. The locomotive will be an able assistant to the educator and the administrator.

And this new condition of things, by which the investment of capital has been made not only safe but profitable, has been brought about by the wise administration of the islands by this Government during the past five years. But the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS], who is now in a position where he can simply criticise, insists that we ought to give free trade at once to the islands, and that then we ought to give independence. No one knows, Mr. Chairman, better than the learned and scholarly gentleman from Mississippi—and I know of no better student of history in this body—no one knows better that he that the progress of civilization and the development of government always proceeds per gradum and not per saltem. Those who are responsible for government, bearing this principle in mind, must see to it that all advances are made gradually and as conditions will permit.

The contention of the gentleman from Mississippi that we should at once give free trade, and then give independence, reminds me of the traveler who was leaving on a steamboat, and after the ship had got 20 feet from the dock found that his companion was left behind, and called out to him, "Come on, don't be a coward, you can make it in two jumps." [Laughter.]

Well, Mr. Chairman, just as air and water would have been an unsubstantial footing for the traveler's second leap, so the superheated, declamatory atmosphere of the hustings that sometimes escapes almost unconsciously in this Chamber is an extremely unsubstantial footing from which to take a step in an important matter of Government development.

If the gentleman from Mississippi were the leader of the majority in this House, or if he were the President of the United States—and I know of no abler man for his party to select as leader—if he were in a position responsible for this Government, he, in his wisdom, would know that in proceeding thus gradually we are proceeding in the only wise and safe way.

Now, let me invite your attention to the objections that have been made by those in the right camp, the objections that came from those who believe that in this bill we are violating the protection policy of the Republican party. The views of these gentlemen are entitled to most careful consideration, because, as I have said, we do not admit that we are passing this legislation because we must, but because we think it is wise and prudent. In my opinion the gentlemen who oppose this legislation because they are fearful that it will injure certain important interests are perfectly correct in the stand which they take, that nothing in the Constitution or the laws makes this legislation compulsory, as is contended by the leaders on the other side. And before we pass to the consideration more in detail of these objections I want, Mr. Chairman, to speak of one exaggerated statement which I am sure we all regret very much has crept into this debate.

A few gentlemen have strayed so far away from the paths of probabilities even as to suggest that this largely altruistic measure—favored by the President, seconded by the Secretary of War, asked for by the majority of American people—is conceived and pressed in the interests of some trust or combination.

Mr. Chairman, I know that it has been somewhat of a fashion of late outside of this Chamber to cast some aspersions and ridicule upon it. Mostly these criticisms are good-natured gibes at a public body. Now and then, however, we hear in this Chamber, as we heard during the last session of Congress from an eloquent gentleman on the other side of the House, some reflections cast upon the ability, the character, and the dignity of this body. Mr. Chairman, the good-natured flings of the public orator and the sincere criticism of friends of this Government we can accept in the spirit in which they are offered. But I think we should on all suitable occasions, Mr. Chairman, rebuke, and rebuke with all the emphasis in our power, all aspersions, whether from without or from within, upon the integrity of this great assembly. I say to you, Mr. Chairman, that from the time that Muhlenberg called to order the first session of the First Congress and looked down into the eyes of such men as Sherman and Trumbull and Ames and Van Rensselaer, Hugh Williamson, and James Madison—from that time to this there never, in my opinion, has been a time when the character of this body, on both sides of the aisle, for ability, integrity, and devotion to the public interests has been greater than it is at the present time. [Applause.]

Why, Mr. Chairman, the octopus has not been spawned that can ever influence this body to advance any legislation that is dishonest or dishonorable or that seeks to thwart the will or violate the national conscience. And, Mr. Chairman, it has not entered into the imagination of any man to conceive of an octopus who would be so far lost to all sense of his octopean safety as to attempt to tackle the President of the United States [applause]; and if he should attempt to take the President and manage him in one tentacle and the Secretary of War in another he would think that he had been struck by a typhoon from above and an earthquake from below off the island of Negros. [Laughter and applause.] Why, I should not have been surprised if somebody had risen and maintained that, as the carabao would be admitted under this bill free of duty, therefore capital in the United States was eager and impatient to go to the Philippines and gather together in flocks or herds or shoals or bevies or schools, or in whatever other forms these beasts migrate, and swim them over here to the port of San Francisco without any cost of transportation, so that they could bring them in here to compete with our cattle upon a thousand hills in furnishing to the free-born American citizen an oriental substitute for the traditional beefsteak of our fathers, and that this bill was really in the interest of the beef trust. [Laughter and applause.] Mr. Chairman, such exaggerated statements, it seems to me, are hardly worthy of consideration or of mention, unless it be to show the unsubstantial grounds upon which some of the opponents of this bill stand.

But, Mr. Chairman, I have great sympathy for those who really feel that the interests in which they have embarked are going to be ruined or seriously retarded by the passage of this bill, and I have a great respect for the arguments that have been adduced here by those gentlemen representing districts in which such persons reside. I have thought, myself, that some of us who favor this bill have not been sufficiently alive to the business situations in some of those districts represented by Members who oppose the measure. The distinguished gentleman from Missouri who thinks that this bill should provide at once for free trade might take a different view of it if his environments were different. If, for example, the Filipino could produce and lay down in the city of St. Louis as good wine as they make in the State of Missouri, and at a less price and in unlimited quantities, I am sure that the gentleman from Missouri would scan the measure with great care before giving it his unqualified approval as a Democratic measure. But the gentleman from Missouri goes much further than to insist that this should be a free-trade measure. The gentleman from Missouri, in a colloquy between himself and the gentleman from Louisiana, made the statement that the Dingley tariff bill is a curse to the whole American people. Well, Mr. Chairman, if it has been a curse to the whole American people it has been pro tanto a curse to a very large part of them who reside in the glorious Commonwealth of Missouri, so ably represented by our eloquent friend.

How has the Dingley law cursed Missouri? Why, it seems to me it has cursed that great State in just the way that Balaam uttered his curse for Balak the son of Zippor. His curses turned to blessings in his mouth before he could utter them, and he said, "How shall I curse, whom God hath not cursed?" and looking forward to the great prosperity which the chosen people were to enjoy, he uttered that splendid prophecy of what he saw in his vision: "How goodly are thy tents, O Jacob! and thy tabernacles, O Israel! As the valleys are they spread forth, as gardens by the river's side, as the trees of lign aloes, which the Lord hath planted, and as cedar trees beside the waters." What a perfectly ideal picture of Missouri at the present time—a garden by the river's side [applause on the Republican side] and a very fruitful garden indeed.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman a question if it will not interrupt him.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Illinois yield?

Mr. BOUTELL. Certainly; it will not interrupt me at all, and I yield with great pleasure.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Do you think that Missouri owes its rich land and its fine crops and splendid climate to the Dingley bill?

Mr. BOUTELL. No, it does not, but it owes to the Dingley bill the opportunity to sell those crops to people in the United States who have the money to buy them. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Let me ask you another question.

Mr. BOUTELL. Yes.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Has the Dingley bill ever enabled the Missouri farmers to sell a bushel of corn or a bushel of wheat or a pound of pork or a pound of beef in any foreign markets?

Mr. BOUTELL. The Dingley bill has enabled the people of Missouri to sell barrels and barrels of great red apples, and cases and cases of grapes, and stoops and stoops of wine a great deal higher than they could have sold them without the Dingley bill. Mr. Chairman, nine years ago the State of Missouri was in a desolate condition. The mortgages covered that State until it looked like a tented field. To-day there are not enough mortgages on Missouri farms to furnish paper on which to write the gentleman's speech in which he assailed the system under which these mortgages were paid off. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Why, Mr. Chairman, the State of Missouri to-day literally flows in milk and honey, and it is the greatest honey-producing State in the country. The laboring man in the State of Missouri has buckwheat cakes and honey for breakfast, roast beef for dinner, and fried chicken for supper. [Applause on the Republican side.] Blessings have flowed in upon that State during the past eight years from all sides and to all people. The farmers have been prosperous, the manufacturers have been prosperous, the laboring men have been well paid, and they get more for their money. The lead and zinc works in the gentleman's State, under the Dingley law, which doubled the duties on these minerals, have increased their output nearly 300 per cent. The men employed have increased nearly 50 per cent. On all sides and from all sources prosperity and blessings, instead of curses, have come to Missouri.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Now, Mr. Chairman——

Mr. BOUTELL. Just a moment, until I have described the rest of the blessings, and then we will take them all in at once. [Laughter.] During the last year they held the largest and finest, or perhaps I ought to say next to the largest and the finest, exposition that was ever held on earth. And why? Because when that exposition was planned the National Treasury had money available, and we were glad to use it for the purpose of putting that exposition on its feet—money brought into the Treasury under the Dingley law, when it was empty and when the Dingley law was passed. [Applause on the Republican side.] And it put the money into the pockets of the people, so that they could go to Missouri and spend their money, and to some people it gave pockets—who did not have even these before the law was passed; and the greatest of all the blessings that the Dingley law brought was that at the last election the great Commonwealth of Missouri was brought into the Republican column for Roosevelt and Fairbanks, and put a Republican Senator at the other end of the Capitol, and brought nine Republican Congressmen from Missouri into this Chamber. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Now, Mr. Chairman——

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. BOUTELL. I have just come to the last blessing. [Laughter.] It is one that interests the gentleman especially.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. All right.

Mr. BOUTELL. I do not want to leave this out; this is the best of all.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. All right; put it in.

Mr. BOUTELL. Now, Mr. Chairman, in view of all this that has taken place under the blessings of the Dingley law, I can think of only one other blessing that it could confer upon the State of Missouri, and that is, as it has induced his colleague, the learned gentleman who addressed us this morning [Mr. DE ARMOND], finally to make up his mind that free trade is an idle and academic dream, the last, the greatest, the supreme blessing that the Dingley law could confer upon Missouri and her able Representative who sits before me would be to convert him, body, soul, and spirit, to the principles of the Republican party, and to send him here as a Republican Senator to see that these blessings are not lost in the future. [Loud applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BOUTELL] has expired.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman be allowed to finish his speech without limit.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CLARK] asks that the gentleman from Illinois be permitted to finish his speech without limit. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BOUTELL. I thank the gentleman from Missouri for his courtesy, and I would say, Mr. Chairman, that it would take this entire session to give all the blessings that have come to the State of Missouri under the Dingley law. [Laughter.]

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, I want to make two remarks. One of them is, that I desire to thank the gentleman for his splendid eulogy on Missouri and, second, one is to inform him and the House and the country that we were brought up on that bill of fare that he has described, and have always used it, namely, high tariff, low tariff, and no tariff. God Almighty gave it to us and the Republican party can not take it away from us. [Laughter and applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. BOUTELL. And the Dingley bill has given your people the money with which to buy it. Now, if the gentleman wants to put to a fair test his proposition that the Dingley bill is a curse, or his proposition to tear down the custom-houses of the country, I will just meet him on fair grounds. We are going to have a Congressional election before very long, and if the gentleman will accept my proposition I will agree to go over in his district and spend all the time that is necessary to demonstrate that the people of Missouri don't approve of these propositions. If he will go before the people of his district next November with the alternative proposition of either tearing down the custom-houses and removing the duty on musical instruments—including the great Schwarzer zither, which surpasses any instrument of the kind in the world—on pearl buttons, on wines, on grapes, on apples, on horses, on Portland cement, on lead, on zinc ore, or of slightly increasing the duties on these different articles, I will undertake to get nine out of ten men of that district to vote for the latter alternative.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Is that your proposition?

Mr. BOUTELL (continuing). And the morning after the election I think we will find that the candidate who was in favor of a slight increase rather than the total abolition of all duties will have been elected, and in the "cold, gray morning" we shall see the gentleman from Missouri sitting in solitary but dejected grandeur amid the ruins of the custom-houses and the wreck of his own political fortune, murmuring sadly to himself the words of that pathetic Pike County ballad:

> How vain it was for me to play
> When all the rest stood pat;

[Laughter.]

> I hardly know what hit me,
> Or even where I am at.

[Great laughter.]

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, I want to make one statement and ask the gentleman one question. I will welcome the gentleman to my district in a joint discussion in every county in it on the proposition that he has made. More than that. I will welcome any living Republican to a joint discussion in that district of this proposition. Now, the speech from which he was quoting about tearing down custom-houses was made nine years ago. I want to ask the gentleman this question: How many gentlemen on that side of the Chamber he thinks are going to make a speech that will live nine years? [Great laughter.]

Mr. BOUTELL. Mr. Chairman, I can only make a guess that the part of this speech at least which describes the great blessings that have been conferred upon the people of Missouri under the Dingley bill and the present glorious condition of that State will last not only nine years, but ninety and nine years. [Laughter and applause.]

Now coming back to what I was saying before these digressions relating to blessings—coming back and gathering up the thread of my argument—I think that we all should perhaps feel more deeply the force of the arguments of those who represent rice, sugar, and tobacco constituencies if we were similarly situated.

Now, Mr. Chairman, it has been maintained by those on the right in opposition to this bill that this measure will ruin certain industries—that, I think, must be considered an exaggerated statement—or that it will prejudicially retard the development of certain industries. Let us consider first the facts and then the probabilities. The industries which are supposed to be prejudicially affected by this bill are rice, tobacco, cigars, and sugar. What is the situation as regards rice, Mr. Chairman? I want to assure the committee that I am not going into any elaborate details or any complicated figures. As I said in my opening remarks, I should be glad if in closing this debate we can consider the facts and arguments before us from a judicial point of view. Let us, then, take the facts as they actually exist and then the probabilities.

Now, the facts in reference to the rice industry are these: The Philippine Islanders consume annually something over a billion and a quarter pounds of rice, as nearly as I have been able to make out from the statement of the Department. The Philippine Islanders produced last year, say, 850,000,000 pounds of rice, and imported from other countries, say, 500,000,000 pounds. The Philippine Islanders export no rice. The United States produces and consumes about 500,000,000 pounds of rice, and exports about 100,000,000 pounds, and offsets that by imports of about the same amount. It does not seem possible—certainly it does not seem probable—that this great rice-consuming country, the Philippine Archipelago, will ever be in a position to ship rice to the United States in anything but very insignificant quantities. It should be borne in mind that rice is almost the sole article of food among the Filipinos.

As I said, they consume about a billion and a quarter pounds of rice annually, whereas the United States, with more than ten times the population of the Philippine Islands, only consume about 500,000,000 pounds. There is this to be said for the encouragement of the rice industry in this country, that the consumption of rice is increasing rapidly in this country as its value as a food product is becoming better known; so that I do not think that those engaged in the rice culture in this country have any ground for fear. On the other hand, with freedom of trade between the archipelago and the United States, with the people of the Philippine Islands prospering in their staple products of hemp and copra, they will become importers themselves of rice from the United States.

Next let me speak of the cigars and the tobacco. What are the great striking facts in reference to this industry? These, without wearying you with details, mentioning just what we can carry in our minds, are as follows: We produce and consume in the United States annually 7,500,000,000 cigars. Our importations, mostly those of a superior quality, are far less than 100,000,000. Our annual average increase in the consumption of cigars is about 325,000,000. What were the importations to the United States from the Philippine Islands last year, with a preferential against other countries by the refunding of the exports? Leaf tobacco, none; cigars, $6,700 worth, barely enough to cover returning travelers and Army and Navy officers. Substantially no Philippine cigars have been imported commercially into the United States; cigarettes, $30 worth; other forms of manufactured tobacco, including snuff and the like, none. That is the story of the total effect of Philippine cigars and tobacco upon the United States under the preferences given to the archipelago last year.

My view of this matter, Mr. Chairman, bearing these facts in mind, is that never under any possible circumstances will Philippine tobacco or Philippine cigars compete in any way with the American product. When our people want a low-priced cigar, we can now make in this country from American tobacco and by well-paid American labor the best low-priced cigar that is made in the world. If it were not too late, speaking of the quality of the Philippine cigars, I should like to illustrate their quality by the names given to them by a humorous cigar manufacturer and retailer in my district, because it seems to me they illustrate what we have at present to fear from the Philippine cigars better than anything that I have heard. I want to talk about facts now, and I propose to talk of probabilities a few minutes later on.

I went into one of these stores, kept by a friend of mine, who has a small factory in the rear and a fine store in front, and although I myself do not smoke, I asked him if he had any Philippine cigars. He smiled a peculiar, incredulous smile, and said, "Yes; he had three varieties." I said I would like to see them, and he put his weird-looking products of oriental manufacture before me and told me their names. He said he called one brand the "New Year's Eve," the second, "One Hundred Per Cent," and the third, the "Boomerang." I said: "Where in the world did you get those names for those peculiar-looking cigars?" He said: "Those names are my own. Those cigars came here nameless. They are orphans, and I gave them their names. The 'New Year's Eve' is the cigar I sell to the man who has sworn off. He smokes one of those on New Year's eve and he never wants to smoke another cigar as long as he lives." I said, "What is the 'One Hundred Per Cent?'" He said, "Well, I give away cigars occasionally to my customers, but of course whenever I give away a cigar I expect that the man will buy twice as much on account of the cigar I gave him. So when I give away a cigar I offer him the 'One Hundred Per Cent,' and when he has smoked it he has to smoke two of my best cigars to take the taste of that one out of his mouth." Then I said, "Well, what is the 'Boomerang?'" "'The Boomerang,'" said he, "is a campaign cigar." I said, "I do not understand why you give it that name. I should be afraid to give one of those to anybody during a campaign." He said: "That is just the point. When you are running for office you get somebody to give about a thousand of those cigars to your opponent, and the cigars that come to him in that way he naturally distributes freely to his acquaintances. Every time he gives one of those cigars away he loses a vote." [Laughter.]

So that even popular humor and wit have thrown a character around those products and given them a name and reputation, and I do not think the American workman need have any fear whatever of competition from cigars of this character.

Mr. KEIFER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman let me ask him one question?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Illinois yield to the gentleman from Ohio?

Mr. BOUTELL. Certainly.

Mr. KEIFER. I have listened to the gentleman's splendid speech and agree with most of it, but I should like to know how much revenue is expected to arise, if this bill becomes a law, from the introduction into this country of such cigars as he has just described?

Mr. BOUTELL. That is quite a fair question and one that I expected to answer later in detail. My best guess, and it is only a guess—I am simply telling what I know of Philippine cigars—is that the revenue on cigars coming from the Philippine Islands will be substantially nothing. I do think, however, that of course there will be some revenue from sugar, and I think that this sugar feature of the measure is one that we should scrutinize with great care. Now, what are the facts with regard to sugar?

As I recollect it, we consume in this country annually about 2,700,000 tons of sugar. Now, where do we get this sugar? From the cane fields in this country, from the beet-sugar farms in the country, from Hawaii and Porto Rico—about, in round figures, 900,000 tons. From foreign countries now paying the full Dingley rates, 600,000 tons. From Cuba, 1,200,000 tons, paying 80 per cent of the Dingley rates.

It will be observed, Mr. Chairman, that we are now compelled to import in the neighborhood of 2,000,000 tons of sugar a year. What, if anything, have we had from the Philippine Islands? During the time of our occupation the importation into this country from the Philippine Islands has ranged from 2,000 tons up to 38,000 tons. The arguments that have been made on the floor of this House in favor of the sugar industry, it seems to me, has been remarkably fair and candid, but these arguments have necessarily proceeded upon the testimony that was given before the Commission, and before the committee of the House. And some of the statements before that committee, and some of the statements that have been published for the purpose of influencing Members, have been of that highly exaggerated character as to be away beyond our serious attention, and merit, it seems to me, only ridicule.

I know of no better thing that has been said in this debate than the summing up of the character of that testimony by the eloquent gentleman from Missouri. It seems as though some of the witnesses were basing their calculation on three crops in the Philippine Islands. First, the entire arable land was sown with sugar, and then after that was garnered the entire arable land was sown with tobacco, and when that had been cut the entire arable land was sown with rice, and all three crops were sent yearly to the United States. I have seen a printed statement giving the acreage in sugar last year. I think it was 150,000 acres, and then showing how much sugar could be raised by increasing the acreage. It went on in a grand crescendo, until it stated that 1,500,000 acres would furnish all the sugar needed in the United States, and 3,000,000 acres all the sugar needed in Europe. When I had read this statement, and other similar documents intended to influence the judgment of the Members of this House, I could not think but that they were worthy only of that consideration which we should give to those portentous suppositions with which our mothers and our nurses used to startle us in infancy:

If all the world were water
And all the water were ink,
What should we do for bread and cheese?
What should we do for drink?

Such wild exaggerations can only be answered by suppositions still more ridiculous:

If all the isles were sugar
And all the sugar cigars,
The Philippines could serve the earth
And export some to Mars.

Of course we expect this bill to help the Filipinos; of course we expect this bill to encourage cigar and tobacco production in the Philippines; of course we expect the importations to this country to increase, and in my opinion—now comes the matter of probability—they will not increase to any large extent. What is the great export of the Philippines? Hemp. There were $22,000,000 worth of hemp exported last year as against two or three millions of sugar, the next largest crop. What is the greatest food crop of the Philippines? Rice. Nearly 900,000,000 pounds were raised last year. The sugar and tobacco of the Philippine Islands, so far as we can judge from evidence worthy of consideration, beyond that necessary to supply their own wants will naturally seek the markets at their doors, namely, the Orient. There will be a slightly increased importation of sugar into this country, but I should doubt whether for many years to come it would ever go beyond the 200,000 tons limit. So that it seems to me, Mr. Chairman, that those who are interested in the sugar industry need have no fear of the effect of this measure on their industry.

As the gentleman from Massachusetts so well said, the Americans are an energetic people; they are an advancing people, and they are going, I hope, in some numbers to the Philippine Islands. Some one once said at a banquet in Alaska that since the landing at Plymouth Rock and Jamestown the great army of American pioneers had never disbanded. And it never will. They have crossed the plains, scaled the mountains, and breasted the waves of the Pacific. Ordinarily immigration and capital move along isothermal lines, but isothermal lines are too narrow and restricted to restrain the energy and progress of the American people, and we may hope assuredly to do something by American energy and American capital to advance the condition of the Philippine Islands. But, Mr. Chairman, we need have no fear in this country of competition with the laborers of those islands. We all know that our immigration laws have been thrown around them; we know the Chinese can not come in there, and our farmers and our tobacco raisers and our cigar manufacturers, with all the capital and energy that will be attracted from this country need have no fear of the only labor which is there, namely, the Filipino labor. Look over the history of the world, Mr. Chairman and gentlemen. Never since the dawn of history in the competition for the world's supremacy has a man with a coat ever had need to fear competititon with a man who wears only sunshine. [Laughter.] So it will be to the end of time.

Now, Mr. Chairman, let me say, in closing, a few words in reference to what I think is the strongest reason why we should pass this bill. I stated some time ago that in broad terms one of the reasons for passing this bill is because all the intelligent people of the Philippine Islands want it. That, Mr. Chairman, is my principal reason for voting for this bill. Without going into the details of the reason why the Filipinos want this bill, let me give you briefly the grounds for this position which I take. I have heard, if my recollection serves me right, even in this debate, that old wish expressed, "Oh, that Dewey had sailed away from Manila the day after he destroyed the Spanish fleet." I should like, Mr. Chairman, at this time to use whatever influence I have to give final and decent burial to the phrase. Whenever that phrase is uttered it is uttered by men, however good their motive, who forget that Dewey's victory at Manila was the first and not the last act of the war with Spain; that the Philippine Islands were Spanish territory; that it was three months before the war was closed. For Dewey on his own motion to have sailed away from Manila the day after his victory would have been a crime. For the National Administration to have withdrawn him would have been worse than a crime, it would have been a grave national blunder. [Applause on the Republican side.]

So, then, we were compelled by a decent regard, if you please, for the opinion of mankind to keep the Philippine Islands. The treaty with Spain ceded them to us and provided the status of their citizens should be fixed by Congress. Now, without expressing my personal wish for the future of the islands, let me say that, so far as I am aware, no man in this country, whether in or out of the sphere of political influence, has ever expressed the view that the Philippine Islands should be left by us at once. In other words, whether we occupy the Philippine Islands for a year or a century, or whatever the ultimate outcome will be, while we hold them we need their friendship. We have heard it stated in this debate by many gentlemen that they would like to see the Philippines given their independence by the United States. But I ask you, Mr. Chairman, is there any man in this Chamber, any man within the sound of my voice, any man within the confines of this Republic, who would like to see the Philippine Islands taken from us? When our war with Spain broke out the Philippine Islands constituted Spain's weakest point. So long as we hold the Philippine Islands they will be our weakest point in any naval contest. While we hold them it is of the utmost importance that we should conciliate them.

As we look back over the pages of history we find that no partnership of any kind between two people has ever been successful, no amalgamation has ever been peaceful except where the stronger party, by every possible means, has conciliated the weaker. The victories of Greece were lost because she treated the inhabitants of all conquered territory as barbarians. The legions of Rome were unable to stand against the hatred that Rome herself had put into the hearts of the Germans. The spirit of those Teutons that slept under the drums and tramplings of innumerable conquests rose and spurred on their descendants to victory. The Napoleonic system fell to pieces on account of the scorn and contempt with which he treated the people whom he had released from the thralldom of feudalism. To-day Finland and Poland are crouching lion's whelps beside the Russian bear because of the attempt to Russify these patriotic, liberty-loving, intelligent people. [Applause.] Great Britain learned from her American colonies a lesson for all time, and at once began a conciliatory course toward her other colonies, with the result that to-day her over-sea possessions contain the most loyal subjects of the Empire. So whatever may be in the future it is of the utmost importance that the Filipinos should be our friends.

You conciliate a nation as you conciliate an individual, by giving him what he wishes, not by offering him something equally as good in your opinion or by forcing upon him something that he does not wish. And the friendship that we want with all the people whom we control is not the subservient, time-serving regard of a sycophant to a condescending almoner. What we want is the frank and open friendship that may exist between nations as between individuals. And in passing this bill we give the Filipinos the right hand of fellowship and a pledge of friendship.

Mr. Chairman, I do not belong to that school of philosophers which believes that, unlike individuals, nations must always be governed by selfish motives. I believe that in a democracy especially there is among the people what we may call national generosity and a national conscience. St. Paul, who wrote that letter to the Philippians, was the broadest-minded man of his day. He was not only an enthusiastic missionary, he was a great statesman. He would have adorned the councils of any country in ancient or modern times. And when he said to those people in that letter, "Think not every man of his own things, but every man also on the things of others," he enunciated a principle of conduct as applicable to nations as to individuals. If we take this principle as our guide, every dictate of national honor should lead us to give the Filipinos what they ask. The warning voice of all the ages cries to us:

> Go put your creed into your deed,
> Nor speak with double tongue.

Let us, so far as in us lies, show those people what we mean by civil liberty and self-government; and if the strain ever comes while we have control over them, let us hope that they will be amongst the most loyal supporters of our flag.

Now, then, with what, it seems to me, is this strong, this absolutely unanswerable reason for voting for this bill, what shall we say for these economic grounds of opposition that simply rest in the future? Those who fear that their industries will be injured have simply been alarmed by phantoms of their imagination. Our worst fears, Mr. Chairman, are always those which are never realized. The phantoms that have appeared to disturb those who antagonize this legislation are phantoms of the mist. They are only visible in the lower places. Let us take a broad view of this proposition. We are summoned to discharge a great responsibility, to take an important step in government development. To you, my friends, who have honestly opposed this measure let me say, stand on the height, face the rising sun,

> And in thinnest air shall melt away those phantom shapes forlorn,
> When across your brow you feel the odor-winds of morn.

Mr. Chairman, in determining our course in the present emergency, it seems clear to me that the path of economic wisdom is also the path of national duty and of national honor, and that this measure should receive the unanimous vote of the House of Representatives. [Loud applause.]

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Chairman, as I understand this is the last speech, and there are no other requests to speak, I move that the committee do now rise; and then we can take up the bill in the morning for amendment.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. OLMSTED, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had further considered House bill No. 3—the Philippine tariff bill—and had come to no resolution thereon.

SENATE BILLS REFERRED.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, Senate bills of the following titles were taken from the Speaker's table and referred to their appropriate committees, as indicated below:

S. 21. An act granting a pension to Mary G. Bright—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

S. 783. An act granting an increase of pension to Moses H. Sawyer—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

S. 1408. An act granting an increase of pension to Julia W. Estes—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

S. 988. An act granting a pension to Russell A. McKinley—to the Committee on Pensions.

S. 336. An act granting a pension to Abraham M. Cory—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

S. 2082. An act granting an increase of pension to Elizabeth T. Carpenter—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

SWEARING IN OF A MEMBER.

Mr. Hermann appeared at the bar of the House and took the oath of office.

Mr. PAYNE. I move that the House do now adjourn.

The SPEAKER. Will the gentleman withhold that motion for a moment?

PONCE RAILWAY AND LIGHT COMPANY, PORTO RICO.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States; which was read, referred to the Committee on Insular Affairs, and ordered to be printed:

The Senate and House of Representatives:

Referring to section 32 of the act approved April 12, 1900, entitled "An act temporarily to provide revenues and a civil government for Porto Rico, and for other purposes," I transmit herewith an ordinance enacted by the executive council of Porto Rico granting to the Ponce Railway and Light Company, its successors and assigns, the right to pass its cars over a certain piece of track on Real street, Ponce Playa, P. R., owned and operated by the American Railroad Company of Porto Rico.

This ordinance has been approved by the President.

Attention is invited to the accompanying report of the Secretary of State.

THEODORE ROOSEVELT.

THE WHITE HOUSE, January 15, 1906.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted to Mr. ALLEN of New Jersey, indefinitely, on account of illness.

Mr. PAYNE. I renew my motion to adjourn, Mr. Speaker.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly (at 4 o'clock and 34 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, the following executive communications were taken from the Speaker's table and referred as follows:

A letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a copy of a communication from the Acting Secretary of War submitting an estimate of appropriation for the Isthmian Canal Commission—to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

A letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a copy of a communication from the Secretary of the Interior submitting an estimate of appropriation for the International Seismological Association—to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

A letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a copy of a communication from the chief clerk of the Court of Claims submitting an estimate of appropriation for contingent expenses of the court—to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

A letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, recommending an appropriation for an improved Government telephone service—to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PUBLIC BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII, bills and resolutions of the following titles were severally reported from committees, delivered to the Clerk, and referred to the several Calendars therein named, as follows:

Mr. WILEY of New Jersey, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, to which was referred the bill of the House (H. R. 7048) changing names of Pierce place, Blake street, Swann street, Cedar street or place, and Oregon avenue to Samson street, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 241); which said bill and report were referred to the House Calendar.

Mr. ADAMS of Wisconsin, from the Committee on Agriculture, to which was referred the bill of the House (H. R. 345) to provide for an increased annual appropriation for agricultural experiment stations and regulating the expenditure thereof, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 242); which said bill and report were referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

SENATE.

TUESDAY, January 16, 1906.

Prayer by Rev. ULYSSES G. B. PIERCE, of the city of Washington.

THE JOURNAL.

The Secretary proceeded to read the Journal of yesterday's proceedings.

Mr. BURROWS. I ask unanimous consent that the further reading of the Journal be dispensed with.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Michigan asks unanimous consent that the further reading of the Journal be dispensed with. Is there objection?

Mr. FRYE. Mr. President, I will make no objection in this case, but I think it is a great deal better, when the Senate is not pressed with business, that the Journal shall be read in full. In this case I shall enter no objection. When there is a heavy pressure of business it is absolutely necessary at times to have the reading of the Journal dispensed with, but not now at the early meeting of the Senate.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. In the absence of objection, the reading will be dispensed with. The Journal stands approved.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

The VICE-PRESIDENT presented the petition of Liliuokalani, ex-Queen of the Hawaiian Islands, praying that she be reimbursed for certain lands in that island taken from her by the United States; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. GALLINGER presented a petition of the board of directors of the Eastern Star Home of the District of Columbia, praying for the enactment of legislation authorizing the Baltimore and Washington Transit Company of Maryland to extend its street railway in the District of Columbia; which was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. LODGE presented a petition of sundry citizens of Gloucester, Mass., praying for the repeal of the duty on domestic alcohol; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. FORAKER. I present a memorial to the Congress of the United States by citizens of the Indian Territory, praying, and setting forth an argument in behalf of their prayer, for separate statehood in the name of Sequoyah. I ask in their behalf that the memorial may be printed as a separate document. It contains a great deal of very valuable information.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Ohio asks that the memorial be printed as a document. The Chair hears no objection, and it is so ordered. It will be referred to the Committee on Territories.

Mr. WARNER presented a petition of the Manufacturers' Association of St. Louis, Mo., praying for the enactment of legislation to enlarge the powers of the Interstate Commerce Commission; which was referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

He also presented a petition of Two Rivers Division, No. 151, Order of Railway Conductors, of Monett, Mo., praying for the passage of the so-called "anti-injunction bill" and "the employers' liability bill;" which was referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

Mr. BRANDEGEE presented a petition of Williams Council, No. 72, Junior Order of United American Mechanics, of Lebanon, Conn., and a petition of Ledyard Council, No. 31, Junior Order of United American Mechanics, of New London, Conn., praying for the enactment of legislation to restrict immigration; which were referred to the Committee on Immigration.

Mr. PENROSE presented petitions of Swatara Council, No. 858, of Middletown; Perryopolis Council, No. 495, of Perryopolis; Berwick Council, No. 693, of Berwick; John Harris Council, No. 174, of Harrisburg; Pleasant Valley Council, No. 330, of Allegheny City; Colonial Council, No. 605, of York; Moses Taylor Council, No. 151, of Scranton; Akron Council, No. 906, of Akron; Etna Council, No. 439, of Etna; Pipersville Council, No. 620, of Pipersville; Frankford Council, No. 176, of Cheltenham; Stroh Council, No. 781; Tescallette Council, No. 442; Elizabethville Council, No. 992, of Elizabethville; Pequea Council, No. 875, of Gap; Bolivar Council, of Bolivar; Mount Moriah Council, of Philadelphia; Resolution Council, No. 6, of Philadelphia; Star Lodge Council, No. 68, of Sargeant; Wyant Council, No. 399, of Oakridge; General McClellan Council, No. 150; Orient Council, No. 72; Hoboken Council, No. 384, of Hoboken; America Council, No. 30; Welcome Council, No. 134, of Pittsburg; Damascus Council, No. 536; Honest Abe Council, No. 66, of Carnegie; Good Will Council, No. 42, of Tyrone; Coalmont Council, No. 860, of Coalmont, all of the Junior Order United American Mechanics, in the State of Pennsylvania, praying for the enactment of legislation to restrict immigration; which were referred to the Committee on Immigration.

Mr. TELLER. I present a memorial of the legislature of Colorado, remonstrating against the enactment of legislation providing for the repeal of all existing desert-land laws. I ask that the memorial be read, and that it be referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

There being no objection, the memorial was read, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands, as follows:

State of Colorado, office of the secretary of state.

UNITED STATES OF AMERICA, State of Colorado, ss:

I, James Cowie, secretary of state of the State of Colorado, do hereby certify that the annexed is a full, true, and complete transcript of senate joint memorial No. 1, which was passed by the fifteenth general assembly of the State of Colorado, approved February 23, 1905.

In testimony whereof I have hereunto set my hand and affixed the great seal of the State of Colorado, at the city of Denver, this 12th day of January, A. D. 1906.

[SEAL.] JAMES COWIE, Secretary of State,
By TIMOTHY O'CONNOR, Deputy.

Senate joint memorial No. 1 (by Senator Taylor), concerning the public-land laws.

To the honorable Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled:

Your memorialist, the fifteenth general assembly of the State of Colorado, respectfully represents to your honorable body that—

Whereas there is now pending before the Congress of the United States a bill providing for the repeal of all existing desert-land laws; and

Whereas it is confidently believed that the campaign for such repeal is being conducted largely in the interests of the land-grant railroads for the purpose of excluding from settlement all lands other than railroad lands; and

Whereas the present desert-land laws facilitate the acquirement of homes by certain of our citizens by reclaiming and developing numerous small intermountain valleys that can not be reclaimed under any other law; and

Whereas the Federal land laws now on our statute books have been of great benefit in the development of this State and have operated satisfactorily wherever their provisions have been carried out in good faith; and

Whereas we believe that any change in the present desert-land laws of the United States would be detrimental to the great intermountain region and would especially retard the development of our State: Therefore,

We earnestly protest against the passage of said bill and against any interference, at this time, with the desert-land laws of the United States; and, further, we direct that a certified copy of this memorial be forthwith sent to our Senators and Representatives in Congress.

Approved February 23, 1905.

Mr. KNOX presented memorials of Local Union No. 172, Cigarmakers' International Union, of Davenport, Iowa; of Hetrick & Sipple, of Erie, Pa., and of the Trades Assembly of Bradford, Pa., remonstrating against a reduction of the duty on cigars imported from the Philippine Islands; which were referred to the Committee on the Philippines.

He also presented petitions of the Woman's Club of Erie; of Mary Boggs, of Monongahela; of the New Century Club, of Philadelphia, and of the Retail Merchants' Association of Pennsylvania, of Erie, all in the State of Pennsylvania, praying for the enactment of legislation to prevent the impending destruction of Niagara Falls on the American side by the diversion of the waters for manufacturing purposes; which were referred to the Committee on Forest Reservations and the Protection of Game.

He also presented petitions of the Christian Endeavor Society of the Brethren Church of Philadelphia; the Young People's Society of Christian Endeavor of Trinity Reformed Church, of Philadelphia; the Woman's Home Missionary Society of Pittsburg, and of Emily Clark Scott, of Pittsburg, all in the State of Pennsylvania, praying for the enactment of legislation to prohibit the sale of intoxicating liquors in the Indian Territory when admitted to statehood; which were referred to the Committee on Territories.

He also presented petitions of A. D. Van Dreisen, of Honesdale; F. W. Steel, of Wyoming; Emily Clark Scott, of East Liberty; D. E. Hutchison, of Kingston; Washington Camp, No. 234, Patriotic Order Sons of America, of Kingston, and of sundry citizens of Kingston, all in the State of Pennsylvania, praying for an investigation of the charges made and filed against Hon. REED SMOOT, a Senator from the State of Utah; which were referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections.

He also presented petitions of Eureka Council, No. 38, Junior Order United American Mechanics, of Eureka; Frankford Council, No. 176, Junior Order United American Mechanics, of Cheltenham; Columbia Council, No. 43, Junior Order United American Mechanics, of Wilkes-Barre; Etna Council, No. 439, Junior Order United American Mechanics, of Etna; Pequea Council, No. 875, Junior Order United American Mechanics, of Gap; Mount Morah Council, No. 546, Junior Order United American Mechanics, of West Philadelphia; Bolivar Council, No. 570, Junior Order United American Mechanics, of Bolivar; Resolution Council, No. 6, Junior Order United American Mechanics, of Philadelphia; Acme Council, No. 219, Junior Order United American Mechanics, of Pittsburg; Good Will Council, No. 42, Junior Order United American Mechanics, of Tyrone; Star Lodge Council, No. 68, Junior Order United American Mechanics; Stroh Council, No. 731, Junior Order United American Mechanics; Perryopolis Council, No. 495, Junior Order United American Mechanics, of Perryopolis; Aliquippa Council, No. 567, Junior Order United American Mechanics, of Aliquippa; Berwick Council, No. 698, Junior Order United American Mechanics, of Berwick; Smoky City Council, No. 119, Junior Order United American Mechanics, of Pittsburg; Rockdale Council, No. 803, Junior Order United American Mechanics, of Rockdale; Star of America, No. 305, Junior Order United American Mechanics, of Rices Landing; Etna Council, No. 439, Junior Order United American Mechanics, of Etna; Pleasant Valley Council, No. 330, Junior Order United American Mechanics, of Allegheny; Tescallette Council, No. 442, Junior Order United American Mechanics, of Pittsburg; Pleasant Hill Council, No. 390, Junior Order United American Mechanics, of Sweet Valley; J. P. Winuwer Council, No. 618, Junior Order United American Mechanics, of Pittsburg; End of Akron Council, No. 906, Junior Order United American Mechanics, of Akron, all in the State of Pennsylvania, praying for the enactment of legislation to restrict immigration; which were referred to the Committee on Immigration.

Mr. HOPKINS presented petitions of sundry citizens of Chicago, Greenfield, Jacksonville, Pittsfield, and Winnebago, all in the State of Illinois, praying for the ratification of international reciprocity treaties; which were referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

He also presented the memorial of David H. Howell and sundry other citizens of Alton, Ill., remonstrating against the ratification of the Isle of Pines treaty; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

He also presented a petition of the congregations of the Methodist Episcopal churches of Kenney and Chestnut, Ill., and a petition of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union of Aurora, Ill., praying for an investigation of the charges made and filed against Hon. REED SMOOT, a Senator from the State of Utah; which were referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections.

He also presented a memorial of Local Union No. 114, Cigar Makers' International Union, of Jacksonville, Ill., and a memorial of Local Union No. 41, Cigar Makers' International Union, of Aurora, Ill., remonstrating against any reduction of the duty on cigars imported from the Philippine Islands; which were referred to the Committee on the Philippines.

He also presented the petition of Dr. J. H. Bacon, of Peoria, Ill., and a petition of the Chicago Grocers and Butchers' Association, of Chicago, Ill., praying for the passage of the so-called "pure-food bill;" which were ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented a petition of Carson, Pirie, Scott & Co., of Chicago, Ill., and the petition of Elliott Durand, of Chicago, Ill., praying for the enactment of legislation to reorganize the consular service of the United States; which were ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented a memorial of sundry citizens of Chicago, Ill., remonstrating against the passage of the so-called "Hepburn pure-food bill" with the clause requiring liquor manufacturers to place formulas upon the label of their product; which was ordered to lie on the table.

PRINTING OF DOCUMENT ON TARIFF QUESTION.

Mr. LODGE. I present a brief address by the president of the New England Tobacco Growers' Association, which I ask may be printed as a Senate document. It is very brief, and deals with the question of tariff.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Massachusetts asks that an article from the Hartford Daily Courant——

Mr. LODGE. It is an address of the president of the New England Tobacco Growers' Association.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Being the address of the president of the New England Tobacco Growers' Association, be printed as a document.

Mr. LODGE. As a Senate document.

Mr. SPOONER. May I ask the Senator from Massachusetts who has the honor to be president of that society?

Mr. LODGE. His name is Mr. H. S. Frye.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Massachusetts? The Chair hears none, and the article referred to will be printed as a Senate document.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. SMOOT, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1231) to reimburse the Becker Brewing and Malting Company, of Ogden, Utah, for loss resulting from robbery of the United States mails, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. FLINT, from the Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1031) granting to the State of California 5 per cent of the net proceeds of the cash sales of public lands in said State, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. CLAPP, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. 567) authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to make an examination of certain claims of the State of Missouri, reported it with an amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. BLACKBURN, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, to whom were referred the following bills, reported them severally without amendment, and submitted reports thereon:

A bill (S. 1933) for the relief of George T. Pettengill, lieutenant, United States Navy; and

A bill (S. 2262) for the relief of Pay Director E. B. Rogers, United States Navy.

Mr. GALLINGER, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. 2073) for the relief of Jeanie R. Bartlett, widow of the late Rear-Admiral John Russell Bartlett, United States Navy, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. BURROWS, from the Committe on Naval Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. 697) providing for the award of medals of honor to certain officers and men of the Navy and Marine Corps, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. HALE, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, to whom were referred the following bills, reported them severally without amendment, and submitted reports thereon:

A bill (S. 90) providing for the deposit of a model of any vessel of war of the United States Navy bearing the name of a State of the United States in the capitol building of said State; and

A bill (S. 1649) providing for the retirement of petty officers and enlisted men of the Navy.

Mr. McCUMBER, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1559) granting a pension to Laura Clark, reported it with amendments, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. PENROSE, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1648) for the relief of the Hoffman Engineering and Contracting Company, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

BELL OF SLOOP GERMANTOWN.

Mr. PENROSE. I am directed by the Committee on Naval Affairs, to whom was referred the joint resolution (S. R. 7) authorizing the Secretary of the Navy to present the bell of the late United States sloop of war Germantown to the Site and Relic Society, of Germantown, Pa. I ask for the present consideration of the joint resolution.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the joint resolution?

Mr. FRYE. Let it be read for information, please.

The Secretary read the joint resolution; and, there being no objection, it was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It authorizes the Secretary of the Navy to present to the Site and Relic Society, of Germantown, Pa., the bell of the United States sloop of war Germantown, which vessel was destroyed by the United States authorities at the Norfolk Navy-Yard in 1861, and the bell of which was recovered about a year ago.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

HEARINGS BEFORE COMMITTEE ON MILITARY AFFAIRS.

Mr. KEAN. I am directed by the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, to whom was referred a resolution submitted by the Senator from Alabama [Mr. PETTUS] on the 15th instant, authorizing the Committee on Military Affairs to employ a stenographer to report hearings before that committee, to report it favorably, with an amendment in the nature of a substitute. I ask unanimous consent for its present consideration.

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the resolution submitted by Mr. PETTUS on the 15th instant, as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Military Affairs is authorized to employ a stenographer, when necessary, for hearings before said committee, to be paid out of the contingent fund of the Senate.

The amendment reported by the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate was, to strike out all after the word "Resolved" and to insert:

That the Committee on Military Affairs be, and is hereby, authorized to employ a stenographer from time to time as may be necessary to report such testimony as may be taken by the committee or its subcommittees in connection with matters before them, and have the same printed for its use, and such stenographer be paid out of the contingent fund of the Senate.

The amendment was agreed to.

The resolution as amended was agreed to.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. FRYE introduced the following bills; which were severally read twice by their titles, and referred to the Committee on Pensions:

A bill (S. 3276) granting an increase of pension to Wallace Fairbank (with an accompanying paper).

Mr. FULTON introduced a bill (S. 3277) to remove the charge of desertion from the record of William W. Kerby; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. FLINT introduced a bill (S. 3278) for the relief of John Goldsworthy; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

He also introduced a bill (S. 3279) to establish four permanent military camp grounds, in the States of Texas, Wisconsin, Pennsylvania, and California, and for the enlargement of the Chattanooga and Chickamauga National Park; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. PERKINS introduced a bill (S. 3280) directing the issue of a check in lieu of a destroyed check drawn by the acting superintendent of the United States mint, San Francisco, Cal., in favor of the San Francisco National Bank, San Francisco, Cal.; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also introduced a bill (S. 3281) authorizing the appointment of William I. Reed, a captain on the retired list of the Army, as a major on the retired list of the Army; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas introduced a bill (S. 3282) for the relief of the heirs of J. J. Myers, deceased; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

He also introduced a bill (S. 3283) for the relief of John H. Hamiter; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. BURKETT introduced a bill (S. 3284) granting an increase of pension to Charles B. Fox; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also introduced a bill (S. 3285) granting an increase of pension to Mary M. Hull; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. CLAY introduced a bill (S. 3286) granting an increase of pension to Mary J. McGehee; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. LATIMER introduced a bill (S. 3287) for the relief of the heirs of Moses Winstock, deceased; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. PENROSE introduced a bill (S. 3288) to authorize the Pennsylvania Railroad Company and the Pennsylvania and Newark Railroad Company, or their successors, to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge across the Delaware River; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

He also introduced a bill (S. 3289) for the relief of James Gwyn; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Claims.

He also (for Mr. CULLOM) introduced a bill (S. 3294) to provide for the erection of a public building at Alton, Ill.; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

BREAKWATER AT NANTUCKET, MASS.

Mr. LODGE. I desire to introduce a joint resolution providing for an examination and survey in the vicinity of Great Point, at Nantucket, Mass., which I ask to have referred to the Committee on Commerce, together with a petition signed by vessel owners and ship captains of New York and other ports on the Atlantic coast. I ask that the petition may be referred with the joint resolution to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. FRYE. It will be better to make it a concurrent resolution rather than a joint. A concurrent resolution is all that is required.

Mr. LODGE. If there is no objection, I will ask that it be changed to a concurrent resolution.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator has a right to have the change made.

The concurrent resolution was read, and, with the accompanying petition, referred to the Committee on Commerce, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring) That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to inquire into the advisability of establishing a harbor of refuge by the construction of a breakwater on the island of Nantucket, Mass., at or near the westerly side of Great Point, for the purpose of providing better protection for commerce and the lessening of the perils of navigation to coastwise traffic in the adjacent waters.

AMENDMENT TO GENERAL DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. NELSON submitted an amendment proposing to appropriate $4,926.67 to compensate the owners of the Norwegian steamship Nicaragua for damage by reason of the rescue of an American citizen, John McCafferty, and the consequent quarantine of said ship at Mobile, Ala., in 1904, intended to be proposed by him to the general deficiency appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on Claims, and ordered to be printed.

EMPLOYMENT OF PILOTS FOR NAVAL VESSELS.

Mr. TILLMAN. I send to the desk a resolution, for which I ask immediate consideration.

The resolution was read as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Naval Affairs be instructed to inquire into the practice of the Navy Department with respect to the employment of competent State pilots for our naval vessels, for the specific purpose of investigating the cause and placing the responsibility for the groundings and collisions which occurred on the 7th instant to three out of five of the most valuable vessels of our Navy, with no pilots on board, while passing out of New York Harbor, and why for the entire fleet only one pilot was employed.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from South Carolina asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of the resolution read. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the question is on agreeing to the resolution.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President, I desire, just for a moment, to call attention again to the occurrence mentioned in the resolution, the collision between one of these battle ships and another, causing immense damage and risk of life. We do not know what the cause was which led to it, but the fact that the one ship which had a pilot on board got out all right and the others following got into a tangle with very dangerous results has caused me to offer this resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

OWNERSHIP OF LAND IN THE PHILIPPINES.

Mr. CULBERSON. I submit a resolution, and ask for its present consideration.

The resolution was read as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, directed to inform the Senate whether any official or officials of the Philippine government own any lands in the Philippine Islands or any interest or right therein, and, if so, to inform the Senate what that ownership or interest is, where the land is situated, and who the official or officials are.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Texas asks the unanimous consent of the Senate for the present consideration of the resolution. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

Mr. FORAKER. I should like to have the resolution read again.

The Secretary again read the resolution.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

Mr. CULBERSON subsequently said: A moment ago the Senate adopted a Senate resolution which I offered, and in order to perfect that resolution I move to reconsider the vote by which it was adopted.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Texas asks the unanimous consent of the Senate for the reconsideration of the vote by which his resolution was passed this morning. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the vote will be regarded as reconsidered.

Mr. CULBERSON. Now, in order to perfect the resolution I wish to add, after the word "government," the words "or officers of the United States Army," and then I ask for its immediate consideration. My amendment will make the resolution read as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, directed to inform the Senate whether any official or officials of the Philippine government or officers of the United States Army own any lands in the Philippine Islands or any interest or right therein; and if so, to inform the Senate what that ownership or interest is, where the land is situated, and who the official or officials are.

Mr. FORAKER. If the Senator will allow me, upon the reading of his resolution, it occurs to me that there may be some difficulty about making an answer to it, unless I have misunderstood the reading of it. It is so broad that it applies to all officers of the Philippine government. Should it not be restricted to such officers of the Philippine government as are appointed by the President or by some authority of the United States?

Mr. HALE. That is right.

Mr. FORAKER. There are officials throughout the islands for whom the United States really has no responsibility, which officials are purely local in their character and in their services.

Mr. HALE. And who ought to own land.

Mr. FORAKER. And who ought to own land and who perhaps have always owned land. I only make the suggestion to the Senator, so that he may put it in form in that respect, if he should approve the suggestion.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Texas yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. CULBERSON. Certainly.

Mr. LODGE. I have no objection to the resolution, but it seems to me the point made by the Senator from Ohio is well taken. The great mass of the clerks and other employees of the Government there are native Filipinos. Of course they own land—I hope they do—and to make an inquiry that would cover, I suppose, local officers as well and to make it through all the provinces as to what land is owned by clerks in the employ of the Government, it seems to me, would be an endless undertaking. I suppose it would apply only to officers of the United States appointed by the President.

Mr. CULBERSON. The resolution is not as broad as is suggested by the Senator from Massachusetts. It does not cover provincial officials in any sense. It is not intended to do that, nor was it intended to cover the entire governmental force of the Philippine government proper. If the Senator from Ohio, who made the suggestion, can improve the resolution in the respect of which he spoke, I am perfectly willing to accept his suggestion.

Mr. LODGE. I suggest that the resolution go over. Then we can look at it and get it in proper form.

Mr. FORAKER. I was about to suggest further that there may be judicial appointees there from the natives. I do not know how that is.

Mr. LODGE. There are.

Mr. FORAKER. I understand there are.

Mr. ALLISON. Nearly all of them.

Mr. LODGE. There are natives on the Commission.

Mr. FORAKER. There are natives on the Commission, who have been there always, who have owned property, and perhaps they would be all the better qualified if they had some interests there to make them conservative and careful in the discharge of their duties.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Under objection, the resolution will go over.

FRENCH COMBATANTS IN AMERICAN REVOLUTION.

Mr. LODGE submitted the following concurrent resolution; which was referred to the Committee on Printing:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That there be printed 3,000 copies of Senate Document No. 77, Fifty-eighth Congress, second session, "Les Combattants Français de la Guerre Américaine, 1778–1783," of which 500 shall be for the use of the Senate, 2,000 for the use of the House of Representatives, and 500 for the use of the National Society of the Sons of the American Revolution, to be distributed under the direction of A. Howard Clark, registrar.

PETITION OF CERTAIN OFFICERS OF THE CIVIL WAR.

Mr. TELLER submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the President be requested to furnish the Senate, if not incompatible with the best interests of the service, the petition and accompanying papers of certain officers of the Army, veterans of the civil war, retired from active service for disability contracted in the line of duty, and who have not yet received the benefits of the act of April 23, 1904.

COMMITTEE SERVICE.

Mr. GORMAN. I ask unanimous consent that the junior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. CLARKE] may be excused from further service on the Committee on Indian Affairs, his name having been placed on that committee by inadvertence.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Maryland [Mr. GORMAN] that the junior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. CLARKE] be excused from further service on the Committee on Indian Affairs? The Chair hears none, and that order is made.

REGULATION OF RAILROAD RATES.

Mr. FULTON. I ask the privilege of calling up from the table Senate bill 2261, an amendment offered by me some days ago to the bill introduced by the junior Senator from Iowa [Mr. DOLLIVER].

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Oregon asks that the Senate proceed to the present consideration of Senate bill 2261.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. What is the bill?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It will be stated.

The SECRETARY. Table Calendar No. 5——

Mr. FORAKER. Do I understand the Senator's request to be that we proceed now to the consideration of this measure?

Mr. FULTON. No; not to proceed to its consideration. I asked leave to call up from the table the amendment which I offered. I wish to submit a few remarks touching the amendment, and then ask to have it referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

Mr. FORAKER. All I want to say is that the bill itself is still pending before the committee.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. The request was for immediate consideration.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Oregon requests leave to take from the table an amendment offered by him to the bill (S. 2261) to amend an act entitled "An act to regulate commerce," approved February 4, 1887, and all acts amendatory thereof. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

Mr. FORAKER. Let the amendment be read.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment will be read for the information of the Senate.

The Secretary read as follows:

Amendment intended to be proposed by Mr. FULTON to the bill (S. 2261) to amend an act entitled "An act to regulate commerce," approved February 4, 1887, and all acts amendatory thereof, viz: After line 22, page 13, insert the following:

"Provided further, That whenever any such court shall find and determine that a maximum rate or charge prescribed by the Commission is confiscatory, it shall be the duty of the court to ascertain and declare what maximum rate or charge would be just and reasonable for the service or services in question, and to accordingly modify, by its decree, the order of the Commission prescribing such rate or charge. The order, as modified by the court, shall be certified to the Commission and shall be by it entered of record, and shall thereupon stand as the order of the Commission until suspended or modified by it."

Mr. FULTON. Mr. President, I do not intend to enter upon a discussion of the general features of the bill to which this amendment is offered, namely, the bill introduced by the Senator from Iowa [Mr. DOLLIVER]. Speaking generally, I think I favor the essential features of that bill, but I believe it should be amended in the respect suggested by the amendment I have proposed; and before referring the amendment to the committee, as I shall ask to have done at the conclusion of the few remarks I will now submit in relation to it, I wish briefly to explain the reasons which actuate me in proposing it.

Under the law as it is at the present time, when complaint is made to the Interstate Commerce Commission that a given rate is unjust or unreasonable, the Commission proceeds to investigate the rate, and if it determines that it is unjust and unreasonable it notifies the carrier to cease exacting that rate and put in force a reasonable rate. If the carrier does not observe the order of the Commission the Commission has but the remedy of proceeding by a suit in equity to enjoin the exaction of the rate which it has condemned as unreasonable. At the termination of the suit, if the court shall find that the Commission was right, that the rate is unjust and unreasonable, all it can do is to enjoin the exaction in the future of that particular rate.

The rate may be very unjust and unreasonable—in such a degree, indeed, that it may be reduced a very considerable sum and yet be unjust and unreasonable. The carrier can make a rate a fraction under that which is enjoined by the court and escape violating the injunction.

Mr. CLAY. Will the Senator allow me?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Oregon yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. FULTON. Certainly.

Mr. CLAY. As I understand the Senator, as the law stands now, when complaints are made to the Interstate Commerce Commission the Commission finds what rates are reasonable and just and recommends to the road that the rate so found be put in operation.

Mr. FULTON. That, I think, is correct.

Mr. CLAY. Then, if the road fails to put in operation the rate recommended by the Commission, the Commission has the power and right to go to the courts, and the courts will determine whether or not they will enjoin the rate put in operation by the road. Then, if the court determines that that rate shall be enjoined, there is no power lodged anywhere to determine what rate shall be reasonable and just.

Mr. FULTON. No.

Mr. CLAY. In other words, as the law stands to-day, the court can find that an unreasonable rate has been put in operation by the road, and while the court finds that to be true, the court, of course, can not fix a reasonable and just rate, and at the same time the Commission can not fix a reasonable and just rate. As we stand to-day, neither the court nor the Commission is required to settle the differences between the shippers and the road and fix and put in operation a reasonable and just rate.

Mr. FULTON. That is correct. The Senator from Georgia states the situation as it is to-day.

Now, it will be said that the bill to which I have offered this amendment will correct that defect in the law. So it will, because it authorizes the Commission not only to inquire whether or not the rate being charged is unjust and unreasonable, but to condemn it in case it finds it to be so, and to substitute instead what it deems to be a just and reasonable maximum rate, and to that extent the Dolliver bill is a great improvement over the present law. But we must keep in mind the fact that the power of Congress to make rates or to authorize a commission so to do is not without limitations. Congress can require that rates shall be just and reasonable, but "just and reasonable" means just and reasonable as to the carrier as well as to the shipper. Indeed, it is probably not far from correct to say that just and reasonable tariff rates are such charges or rates as will yield a sufficient return under ordinarily good business management of the property of the carrier to defray expenses and cost of operation, provide maintenance and a reasonable return on the investment. Should the Commission make a rate or rates that would fall short of such result, they would undoubtedly be held by the courts to be confiscatory and enforcement restrained. It is therefore to the situation that will result under this bill in such contingency that I desire particularly to invite attention.

As I have said, in that it authorizes the Commission to substitute a reasonable for an unreasonable rate, the Dolliver bill cures a defect existing in the present law; but even under that bill, if it shall become a law, we may at any time have this condition: The claim may be made before the Commission that a given rate is unreasonable. The Commission inquires into it and determines that it is unreasonable and substitutes what it deems to be a reasonable rate. The matter is taken into court, and the court holds that the rate substituted by the Commission is unjust and unreasonable, being too low, being confiscatory, and it enjoins the enforcement of that rate. The result would be that under such circumstances the old rate of the carrier, however unjust and unreasonable, would be revived and again put in force, or any rate that the carrier might see fit to substitute might be put in force. There would be no remedy until the Commission had pulled itself together again, taken the matter under consideration further, made another guess as to what the proper rate should be, and put that rate in force; it also might be subjected in turn to the scrutiny of judicial review, and long delay and additional expense ensue.

Now, it seems to me that everyone will agree that it would be at once in the interest of the carrier, in the interest of the shipper, and in the interest of the public alike if, at the time the court holds the rate put in force by the Commission to be confiscatory, it might go a step further and determine then and there what a reasonable and just rate would be for the services in question.

Mr. CLAY. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Oregon yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. FULTON. Certainly.

Mr. CLAY. I should like to ask a question. The Senator says if the rate fixed or recommended by the Commission should be found by the court to be an unreasonable and unjust rate, that his amendment provides that the court shall find what shall be a reasonable and just rate, and shall recommend that rate to the Commission. Would not that be investing the court with the power to make rates? Is that a judicial function or a legislative function?

Mr. FULTON. That is just the question to which I wish to address myself. The question suggested by the Senator from Georgia [Mr. CLAY] is exactly the question I was approaching at the time of his interruption. I am aware that it is contended by some, perhaps by many, that to authorize the court under any circumstances to determine a future rate is vesting the court with a legislative power or function. I do not believe that that question arises under the amendment which I have offered, because the amendment simply requires that the court, having determined that the rate substituted by the Commission is unjust and unreasonable, and therefore enjoined it, shall proceed then to ascertain and declare what the reasonable rate would be—not to enforce it, not to command the carrier to observe it in the future, but to amend the order, to modify the order of the Commission in conformity to the finding of the court, and to certify the modified order to the Commission. Thereupon, not the court, but the law will direct that the Commission adopt that rate and put it in force. That is the proposition I have offered.

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. President, may I interrupt the Senator?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Oregon yield to the Senator from Texas?

Mr. FULTON. Certainly.

Mr. CULBERSON. I should like to ask the Senator if the statement he just now makes accords really with his amendment, if he will pardon me?

Mr. FULTON. Certainly.

Mr. CULBERSON. It reads:

> Thereupon shall stand as the order of the Commission until suspended or modified by them.

The point to which I desire to invite the attention of the Senator is that he authorizes the Commission here to suspend the judgment of the court.

Mr. FULTON. No; not the judgment of the court. The court modifies the order to conform with its finding, and certifies the order to the Commission as modified—that is, it certifies to the Commission the finding that it has adjudged to be a just and reasonable one, and that is sent back to the Commission. The law requires the Commission then to adopt it as being a reasonable and just rate until such time as the Commission may suspend or modify it; in other words, it stands the same as any other order of the Commission. It is not a perpetual order. The Commission is authorized under the bill introduced by the Senator from Iowa [Mr. DOLLIVER] to suspend or modify or set aside its own orders. It makes and order to-day fixing a rate as just and reasonable. The Commission may desire to change that order within six months from now, because the conditions may change, and hence there is a necessity for the Commission being authorized to change the rate. It may be that a rate has become too high, and it may wish to make a reduction. Therefore the Commission must be authorized to modify or suspend its own orders.

Mr. CULBERSON. Now, Mr. President, if the Senator will pardon me, another inquiry——

Mr. FULTON. Certainly.

Mr. CULBERSON. I will ask the Senator what there is in his amendment—he says the rate may be suspended or modified within six months—what is there in his amendment that will prevent the Commission from suspending the order of the court within six days, much less within six months?

Mr. FULTON. Nothing. What is there in the law or in the original bill that prevents the Commission from modifying or suspending its own order in six days, and why should there be anything? Should not the Commission be authorized, whenever conditions change in its judgment to the extent that an order is no longer reasonable, to modify it? I can not see why it should not be vested with such power. But that is a mere matter of verbiage. I am not particular as to that.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President——

Mr. FULTON. I ask the Senator to excuse me for just a second. I am not particular about the wording. My purpose and object is to authorize the court, when it shall determine that a rate substituted by the Commission is unjust and unreasonable, to announce what in its judgment is a reasonable and just rate. That is my purpose, and if the language I have employed does not authorize it I hope a suggestion will be made of language that will authorize it.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Oregon yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. FULTON. Certainly.

Mr. McCUMBER. I simply want to get at the real effect of the reasoning of the Senator. As I understand his proposition, it is simply this: That while he admits that the general power of the legislature, of Congress, to make rates can not be delegated to either the Commission or a court, he still insists that Congress may provide the means whereby a given condition or fact may be found and may then provide a law that will operate upon that fact when it is found; in other words, that Congress has the power to declare a law as to the fixing of rates which shall be held in abeyance and shall only operate when some other tribunal has ascertained what is a reasonable rate. Then, by virtue of the primary law, the rate will go into effect under that law, and not as the act of the Commission or of the court.

Now, the point is this: Suppose that that be true as a general principle, and the court has no power to fix future rates, but at the same time determines what——

Mr. FULTON. I have not admitted that yet.

Mr. McCUMBER. And at the same time determines what is a just rate, and the law thereupon determines that that just rate shall be the rate in the future for that particular road, then that must be necessarily the future rate until the court itself shall again, passing upon the same question, fix another rate. Then the law will operate upon that the second time and will give a second rate. Will not the final result of that be that the court by its decision is in reality making the rate from day to day every time that it changes it, and that in reality it is made upon the discretion and judgment of the court, and not upon the discretion and the judgment of the legislature? I should like to have that point made clear by the Senator.

Mr. FULTON. In the first place, the Senator assumes that I have said that the Legislature, the Congress, may not empower the court to determine and put in force a rate for the future. I have not admitted that proposition as being correct. I have said that I am going to discuss that proposition.

Mr. SPOONER. May I ask the Senator from Oregon a question?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Oregon yield to the Senator from Wisconsin?

Mr. FULTON. In just a second, if the Senator will excuse me. I want to say that I admit, as a general proposition, as an abstract proposition, if you please, that the rate-making power is a legislative function; but when the question is whether or not a certain rate is reasonable in a given case that is a judicial question. Now I will yield to the Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. SPOONER. The question I wanted to put the Senator has practically answered. It is whether the fixing of a rate to be operative in the future can from any standpoint be considered a judicial function?

Mr. FULTON. I think it may.

Mr. SPOONER. Is it not a legislative function?

Mr. FULTON. That depends upon the manner in which the question is presented, in my judgment. Rate making, the fixing of a schedule of rates, is, I say, as a general proposition, an abstract proposition, a legislative power, the exercise of a legislative function; but in a litigated case, where the question at issue is as to what is a reasonable rate for a given service, that is essentially a judicial question.

Mr. SPOONER. Of course that is true; that is, if a question is presented to the court whether a given exaction made by a railway carrier or a schedule for a specified service is or is not an extortion, that is a judicial question. But what will be a reasonable rate next week is not strictly a judicial question.

Mr. FULTON. The Senator from Wisconsin——

Mr. FORAKER. Will the Senator yield to me?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Oregon yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. FULTON. I will yield.

Mr. FORAKER. Mr. President, I wish to say a word in answer to the suggestion of the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. SPOONER]. I understand that there is no difference of opinion on the point that the inquiry as to whether or not any rate is a just or reasonable rate is a judicial function. I do not understand how there can be any difference of opinion on the further proposition that when a court, properly charged, no matter how the issue has been raised, with the duty of making such inquiry, reaches a conclusion as to what is just and reasonable it may enjoin anything that is in excess of that. The effect of that would be, of course, that there could be nothing collected in excess of what is enjoined. It would project itself into the future, but the injunction would rest upon the case that had been made before the court. If anybody wanted to change that by showing a different state of facts to exist at any time, he would be at liberty to do so; and so, when the Commission makes another rate, the parties who are interested might apply to the Commission to make a new order because the conditions had changed. There is no difference, so far as the policy is concerned, or the general principle of the policy is concerned. The policy would apply to one just as well as to the other in the changed condition. If it be a judicial function for the court to ascertain what is a just and reasonable rate, I do not see why the court is not at liberty to give effect to that, not by making a new rate, but by prohibiting anything in excess of what it decides is lawful; and it has a standard already erected by law by which to determine what is the lawful rate.

Mr. FULTON. If I understand the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. SPOONER], he says that while it will be admitted that a determination as to what was a reasonable rate for past services is a judicial question, yet when the question is projected into the future, when the question is what will be a reasonable rate for service to be performed, then it is a legislative question. In other words, I understood the Senator to express a doubt as to whether or not the courts would enjoin a future unreasonable rate. I may have been mistaken in that.

Mr. SPOONER. I merely stated what was the opinion of the Supreme Court in the case in 167 United States Reports.

Mr. FULTON. Yes.

Mr. SPOONER. That whether a given rate is or is not a reasonable rate is a judicial question; but the fixing of a future rate is not a judicial but a legislative question. That is what I meant to say.

Mr. FULTON. That is the proposition I am coming to.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President——

Mr. FULTON. I yield to the Senator from Texas.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, the question whether a given rate is a reasonable one only becomes a judicial inquiry when it is alleged that a certain law deprives a certain corporation of its property without due process of law; or it is possible that in the case of a Federal law it would come under an allegation that it was the taking of private property without just compensation. That is always under that state of the case a judicial question; but the court is only required to decide the precise question presented—that is, whether a given rate is a reasonable one or not; whether that rate deprives the carrier of its property without due process of law, or appropriates for public use private property without just compensation. The court is not, and, in my judgment, the court can not be required to go further and say, not only is this an unreasonable rate, but this other is a reasonable one.

Mr. FULTON. Let me ask the Senator there——

Mr. BAILEY. Just let me finish. I am going to ask the Senator to address himself to this question. If that is right; if to fix a rate operating in the future is a legislative function; if it is only a judicial function to pass upon the reasonableness of an exsting rate as applied to a controversy pending in the court, and then you say that the court may not only decide this is an unreasonable rate, but may go further and say what is a reasonable rate, hereafter the court will answer that it is not a judicial function, and it is not competent for Congress to impose upon a judicial tribunal the performance of such a duty. The court has said that in a case not exactly similar but somewhat parallel.

Mr. FULTON. Let me ask the Senator this question: I understand him to concede that the court may be clothed with the power—indeed, that it is at the present time clothed with the power—to enjoin a future unreasonable rate.

Mr. BAILEY. Oh, no.

Mr. FULTON. An unreasonable rate?

Mr. BAILEY. Oh, no; not to enjoin it, because the question that the court decides——

Mr. FULTON. The court is doing that right along.

Mr. BAILEY. The question that the court decides is as to the rate in the case pending before it. It might happen that the rate might become a reasonable one.

Mr. FULTON. In order to explain myself, let me give the Senator an illustration.

Mr. BAILEY. Let me state another proposition, and then the Senator can answer both at the same time. Here is the same party; here is the same subject-matter; here is a judgment. Now, how are you going to reopen the case? You would have to get new parties to go into court in order to have the court reopen the matter and decide whether this that it decided last month or last year to be a reasonable rate is continuing to be a reasonable rate. It is res adjudicata as between the parties in court.

Mr. FULTON. Well, that presents a difficulty and inconvenience that makes the use of the court for that purpose unwieldy, I concede, but the fact that it is inconvenient to move to modify a decree is not an insuperable objection to the jurisdiction of the court. The Senator knows very well that nothing is more common in equity practice than for the court to reserve the right for the parties to have the decree modified when the conditions shall change. But I do not care to be drawn off into a discussion of that proposition.

Suppose a rate were made of $5 per ton from a given point, say from Marshalltown, Iowa, to Chicago, and the Commission condemns that rate as unreasonable and institutes a suit in court to enjoin the exaction of that rate in the future. The court would have jurisdiction to entertain that suit, I think the Senator will admit. The court would then proceed to inquire and determine whether or not the $5 rate was unreasonable, would it not? The Senator assents that it would. Now, I ask the Senator if in determining that question the court would not have——

Mr. BAILEY. I nodded in assent while I was thinking about another phase of the question. I do not say the court would have the right to decide whether the rate was reasonable; but I do say the court would have the right to say whether it was unreasonable.

Mr. FULTON. That is what I asked.

Mr. BAILEY. Well, there is a vast difference. It might be that a rate of $5 from Marshalltown, Iowa, to Chicago, would be obviously unreasonable, too high, and the court would enjoin that rate without undertaking to decide what was a reasonable rate; or, to take the cases decided, take the case of Reagan against the Farmers' Loan and Trust Company. There the court decided that the rates were so low as to be confiscatory and enjoined the commission of the State of Texas from putting those rates into force; but it was not necessary for the court to say what was a reasonable rate. It simply said the commission's rate was unreasonably low and confiscated the carrier's property. So it might say in the Marshalltown case that the rate charged is unreasonably high and is an overcharge against the citizen for the transportation of his product without saying what was a reasonable rate.

Mr. FORAKER. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Oregon yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. FORAKER. I do not wish to interrupt the Senator from Oregon if he prefers to go on with his remarks.

Mr. FULTON. Just a moment, and I shall be glad to yield to the Senator from Ohio.

I want to suggest to the Senator from Texas that it seems to me impossible for a court to determine that a given rate is unreasonable without, in the first place, ascertaining what would be the reasonable charge. A rate is unreasonable, why? Because it is in excess of what is reasonable. If the rate is not in excess of what is reasonable it is not unreasonable, and in order for the court to determine that a given rate is unreasonable it must, in the first instance, determine in its own mind what would be a reasonable charge. Of course it might be a case such as the Senator says I illustrated. The rate from Marshalltown to Chicago on wheat might be so obviously unreasonable that it would not be necessary for the court to go into a close computation as to just what would be a reasonable rate, but I submit that, ordinarily speaking, the question that the court will have to determine, in the first place, is what is a reasonable rate. Is the rate being inquired into above that? If it is above it, then it is unreasonable. Then, if that is true, the Senator's contention involves this remarkable paradox, that the court may determine what is an unreasonable rate. That is a judicial question, and in order to determine that it must determine what is a reasonable rate, and that is a legislative function. Therefore, in order to reach a judicial determination it must exercise legislative power.

Mr. BAILEY. Will the Senator from Oregon permit me to remind him that in both of the cases where an injunction against confiscatory rates has been issued by the court below and sustained by the Supreme Court of the United States the court expressly refused to decide what was the reasonable rate? They decided both in the Texas case, and then again in the Nebraska case——

Mr. FULTON. And in the Minnesota case.

Mr. BAILEY. The Minnesota case had passed out of my mind and escaped me for the moment; but in the Nebraska case the court indicated pretty fairly and pretty accurately and somewhat elaborately, the elements that must be considered in determining what was a fair rate, but they expressly declined to decide that because the only question before them was whether the existing rate was a reasonable one; whether it confiscated the carrier's property, and they decided that the rate was confiscatory, expressly declining to go any further into it. The same thing happened in the Reagan case. There a set of tariffs had been formulated and adopted by the railroad commission of the State of Texas.

Mr. FULTON. The low-tariff rate was attacked in the court.

Mr. BAILEY. The tariff was attacked in the court upon the ground that it was so low as to be confiscatory. The court decided that it was confiscatory because it practically returned no profit on the investment, but declined to go any further than that.

Mr. FULTON. Why did they decline to go further?

Mr. BAILEY. Because it was not necessary to decide that question. Still the Senator says I involve the court in a contradiction when I say that they can decide what is unreasonable without deciding what is reasonable. I take it that both in court and on this floor it would be entirely possible for the Senator himself, on a moment's consideration, to say that a given rate was unreasonably high or unreasonably low, without determining in his own mind what would be reasonable both to the carrier and to the shipper.

Mr. FULTON. I think the first thing that would present itself to the Senator's mind and to my mind—it would present itself more quickly to the Senator's mind because he has a better mind—but the thing that would present itself to each of our minds in due time would be what is the proper charge, not what is the improper charge, but what is the reasonable charge, what is the proper charge. I yield now to the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. FORAKER. What I wanted to say by way of injection into the Senator's speech, if he will allow me and if we are not interrupting him too much——

Mr. FULTON. I am glad to have interruptions.

Mr. FORAKER. What I wanted to say was that the question of what was a just and reasonable rate was not raised by the pleadings in any case referred to, but only the question whether or not the particular rate challenged was an unreasonable and unjust rate. That is the only question the court was called upon by the pleadings to decide.

Now, to illustrate the difference between those cases. Take the case suggested by the Senator from Oregon [Mr. FULTON] and commented on by the Senator from Texas [Mr. BAILEY]. Let us suppose that we have under consideration a shipment of some kind of freight from Marshalltown, Iowa—I believe that is the name of the place given—to Chicago.

Mr. FULTON. Yes; Marshalltown, Iowa.

Mr. FORAKER. And we will suppose that Congress has acted, that being interstate commerce, and has fixed a specific rate of $5—that was the rate named, I believe, by the Senator from Oregon. That rate having been fixed by law, will anybody dispute that a shipper shipping over that road would have a right to appeal to a court of equity and say, "The rate fixed by statute is $5, but the railroad is exacting $6," and ask the court to enjoin the railroad from collecting the $6 rate? Any shipper could do that to-day without any enabling statute on the subject. Why? Because all in excess of $5 is unlawful, and it is a judicial function to enjoin and prohibit that which is unlawful. Does it alter the principle involved when the Congress, instead of saying the rate shall be $5, says it shall be a reasonable and just rate?

The court in such a case, the rate being challenged, the pleader saying in his bill, that he exhibits, the law authorizes only $5, because that is a reasonable and just rate, but the railroad is charging us $6, which is an excessive and unlawful and unreasonable and unjust rate, does anybody imagine that the court would not have a right, in the exercise of its judicial function, to find out from testimony that $5 was the reasonable and just rate and that $6 was an excessive, unreasonable, and unjust rate? And having ascertained that, and the pleadings having been so framed as to call for a decision on the subject, can anybody question but that it would be the duty of the court to enjoin the excessive rate, or all in excess of $5? The law to-day does prescribe that the rate from Marshalltown to Chicago shall be not $5 a ton on any given kind of freight, but shall be only a reasonable and just rate, whatever that may be found to be upon the testimony offered, and that anything that is unreasonable and unjust is unlawful.

Now, there is no plainer judicial function than to ascertain what is a reasonable and just rate. What is reasonable and just the courts are called upon to ascertain every day in the exercise of their judicial functions, and there is nothing plainer than that when they ascertain what is reasonable and just, whether applied to a railroad or to the exercise of police power, with respect to a tenement house, or whatnot, the court has full equity power to enjoin all that is excessive. The only propriety of any legislation on this subject is that there may be a special procedure that will authorize one proceeding in court on behalf of all the shippers who are alike affected. That is the ground of the legislation, it seems to me, that we want.

So the Senator from Oregon is entirely correct in his contention that it is a purely judicial function to ascertain what is a reasonable and just rate. Now, how far he will go in that I do not know, but it does not divest the court of its power that the order reaches into the future.

If the Senator will pardon me another moment, the order that the railroad shall not exact anything in excess of what the court finds to be just and reasonable projects itself into the future, for all such remedies project themselves into the future. Every injunction operates in the future and is intended to be such a remedy. Just the same kind of an order was made in the Nebraska case, if I am not mistaken in my recollection as to the case in which it occurred. The court would hold that this, naming it, is a just and reasonable rate and no more shall be exacted so long as the conditions established by the testimony in this case may continue, with leave to the parties to come and show that different conditions had arisen and that therefore there was reason for changing the rate.

Mr. President, I ought to apologize to the Senator from Oregon, and I promise him that I will not take any more of his time unless the subject becomes so interesting that I can not help it. I want at an early day to speak on this subject at length.

Mr. FULTON. I hope the Senator from Ohio will interrupt me frequently, because I wish the RECORD to show that I opened the discussion and closed it, and that somewhere between a good speech was delivered.

Mr. BAILEY. If the Senator from Oregon will permit me, I will duplicate the promise of the Senator from Ohio. I want to reply to the Senator from Ohio just this far and only far enough to say that I have not said, and I hope I have not given anybody good reason for supposing that I have said, that the court could not enjoin an unreasonable rate. They can enjoin the rate when fixed by the railroad itself, probably upon the application of a shipper alleging that the railroad charges a certain rate from Marshalltown, in the State of Iowa, to the city of Chicago and that that rate is excessive and unreasonable and unjust.

I think it is undoubtedly true that upon a condition of that kind, upon proof to support it, the court could enjoin the collection of that excessive freight charge. It is absolutely certain, and I take it no Senator would question it, that if the Congress should enact a rate so low as to be confiscatory, acting directly upon the subject, or if through the Commission a rate so low as to deprive the carrier of its property without due process of law or without just compensation for its service, there is no question but that the court would have the power to enjoin that rate. But that is an injunction against an existing rate in a case made up upon allegation and answer, and no court upon a case of that kind has any warrant for making a decree that binds all the balance of the people not represented in that case.

Mr. FORAKER. I agree with the Senator to that extent.

Mr. BAILEY. Now, that the judgment of the court projects itself into the future is obviously true. If the court decrees that the land which I claim belongs by superior title to the Senator from Ohio, that not only binds him and me in that proceeding, but it binds everybody else in interest, so far as the judgment could go. It binds my heir or his heir, but it does not bind anybody except those who claim under him or under me. Other people who have a collateral or possibly an antagonistic interest are not concluded by that judgment. They ought not to be bound by it. So I say——

Mr. FULTON. The Senator from Texas does not understand me as contending that.

Mr. BAILEY. No.

Mr. FORAKER. I hope the Senator does not understand me as saying that. I said that is where came the necessity for creating a special procedure by statutory enactment.

Mr. BAILEY. The Senator from Ohio is always so clear and to the point that I take it he must have misunderstood my statement or he would not have found it necessary to have argued that the courts could enjoin a rate either too high or too low, and I supposed the Senator was replying; and he was making a sufficient reply if that had been my contention. I have never contended that, and I never will contend it. Indeed, the very basis of my contention against this power of determining a future rate by the court is that the business of the court is to determine only the reasonableness or the unreasonableness of a given rate when challenged in a judicial proceeding.

Mr. FORAKER. If the issue be confined to that question, my contention is that you may make an issue as to whether or not, the road being charged with exacting an unreasonable and unjust rate, something else is a reasonable rate by alleging in your bill what is reasonable and just.

Mr. BAILEY. Of course that is presumed to be the power of the court, because if you can raise that question by the proper pleading it is only because the court possesses the power to do it. Of course Congress can confer upon the court that power, and then by a proper set of pleading the court passes judgment.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Oregon yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. NELSON. Will the Senator from Oregon yield to me for a minute?

Mr. FULTON. Certainly.

Mr. NELSON. It seems to me that the only possible exception that can come into any judicial proceeding in reference to the fixing of future rates is this: It is conceded that the courts have no legislative power. It is conceded that they can only pass on a case upon actual existing rates. But there may be such a case, and I put it to the lawyers of the Senate. Suppose a party comes into equity and can make out a case that the railroad company intends in the future to establish such and such a rate, not the rate now in force, but to establish some other rate in the future—they threaten to do it, but have not done it—and that such a threatened and promised rate is an unjust and an unreasonable rate, and asks for the intervention of the court. In such a case I can see that a case could be made, and if the facts were strong enough the court can intervene by injunction on the well-known principle that courts of equity have a right to protect a party against a threatened injury.

Mr. BAILEY. The court decided——

Mr. NELSON. But the difficulty now is, in effect——

Mr. FULTON. Mr. President——

Mr. NELSON. Let me state the proposition.

Mr. FULTON. I am willing to yield to the Senator from Minnesota for a question and for a reasonable statement, but I can not yield the whole afternoon.

Mr. NELSON. I was going to state my proposition, and it is this in effect, that you allow the court to pass upon the matter of future rights, but the difficulty here would be to require the proof to bring a case in that court showing that the railroad company threatened to establish in the future a rate that would be unjust and unreasonable. But if such a case could be made clearly the court could pass upon a future case.

Mr. BAILEY. If the Senator from Oregon will permit me I will state that the Supreme Court of the United States decided in McCord against the Louisville and Nashville Railroad and other railroads that an injunction would not lie against a threatened wrong of that kind.

Mr. FULTON. It would be entirely too remote, I think. In my judgment the injury threatened must be immediate in order that a court of equity may exercise the extraordinary power of injunction to restrain it, and hence a court would not entertain such a case as the Senator from Minnesota suggests. But if an unreasonable rate is in force and the carrier threatens to continue exacting it, I think a different case is presented and one that a court of equity would entertain.

I have been thrown somewhat off the line of discussion I had marked out in my own mind by the various questions of the Senators, but I will pursue the line of thought suggested by those questions.

The Senator from Texas says that in the Reagan case the entire schedule fixed by the commission was challenged as being unreasonable and unjust, and the court contented itself with simply restraining the exaction of the rates prescribed in that schedule and did not go further and determine what was a reasonable rate. That is very true, and that is not all. The court announced in that case the doctrine, as near as I can recall the language of Justice Brewer, that the making of rates—or perhaps he used the phrase "prescribing a schedule of rates for the future"—is a legislative function. But the court there was speaking of the case in hand. The court was speaking of the facts in issue, the case that was before it. It was not pretending to say that the courts could not exercise control over future rates. Manifestly it was not, because since then the Supreme Court has exercised, and is exercising every day, control over future rates, as I shall show very shortly. But in this case the court was considering a prescribed schedule of rates that had been made by the commissioner of Texas by virtue of the authority vested in him by the Texas statute.

Now, the court was not considering and was not discussing whether or not the court might have been invested with the power to determine what was a reasonable rate. The court was simply saying that it had not been invested with that power and hence the statement that in the abstract, as a general proposition, to establish rates is a legislative power. I will call the attention of the Senator to the language of the court; I will cite, because I wish to make reference to it again, from the ninety-fourth of the United States Supreme Court Reports, the statement of Chief Justice Waite in the case of the Chicago, etc., Railroad Company v. Iowa. In that case the court said:

> This company, in the transactions of its business, has the same rights and is subject to the same control as private individuals under the same circumstances. It must carry when called upon to do so, and can charge only a reasonable sum for the carriage. In the absence of any legislative regulation upon the subject, the courts must decide for it, as they do for private persons, when controversies arise, what is reasonable.

Now, that shows that the question as to what is a reasonable rate is a judicial question. Observe that Chief Justice Waite stated that when the statute has not made provision as to what is a reasonable rate, the courts must determine, not what is an unreasonable rate or charge, but what is a reasonable rate for the service in question. Therefore it is a judicial question.

I will also call the Senator's attention to the case of Chicago, etc., Railroad Company v. Minnesota (134 U. S. Reports). The court there was discussing whether or not a given schedule of rates put in force by the commission of Minnesota under the statute of Minnesota was reasonable. They held that it was unreasonable and they enjoined it. During the discussion the court said:

> The question of the reasonableness of a rate of charge for transportation by a railroad company, involving as it does the element of reasonableness both as regards the company and as regards the public, is eminently a question for judicial investigation, requiring due process of law for its determination.

The question of the reasonableness of a rate "is eminently a judicial question," not limited, you will observe, to the question as to whether a rate is unreasonable, as the Senator from Texas would seem to contend the inquiry must be.

It is true that in Interstate Commerce Commission v. Cincinnati, etc., Railway Company (167 U. S., 499) Mr. Justice Brewer said:

> It is one thing to inquire whether the rates which have been charged and collected are reasonable—that is a judicial act—but an entirely different thing to prescribe rates which shall be charged in the future; that is a legislative act.

And that statement is frequently cited as an indication that a judicial tribunal is not competent to determine a rate to be charged in the future. The question as to the power of the court to determine a rate for the future was not before the court and Justice Brewer had not that question in mind. But the statement is clearly correct as an abstract proposition, and in no wise controverts the power of the court to determine what in a litigated case is a reasonable rate to be charged in the future. "To prescribe rates which shall be charged in the future—that is a legislative act," said the learned justice. Certainly. But when that rate is assailed in court and its enforcement in the future is sought to be restrained on the ground that it is unjust and unreasonable, then it becomes as much a judicial act to determine whether or not for a rate in the immediate future it is reasonable as it is a judicial act to "inquire whether rates which have been charged and collected are reasonable."

So it does not depend upon whether the service for which the rate is to be determined is one that has been performed or one that is to be performed—whether the inquiry is confined to matters resting in the past or transactions contemplated in the future—but is the reasonableness of the rate in question; that is the touchstone. If it is, then it is a judicial question and must be determined by the courts. And having determined that a certain rate may not be imposed on a carrier in the future, because it would be confiscatory, would it not be equally a judicial function for the court to ascertain and declare what rate would be just and reasonable?

If I understand the decisions of the Supreme Court, there is nothing more clearly established than the proposition that when the reasonableness of a rate is in question to determine it is a judicial function. When you are talking about prescribing a schedule of rates as an abstract proposition without the parties being before you, without there being any issue, it is clearly a legislative function, and when exercised by the legislature it binds everybody. That is the difference between a rule announced by the legislature and a rule announced by the court. The rule announced by the legislature is made without consulting the public, but it is binding on the public. A rule announced by the court can be enforced only against the parties to the record or their successors in interest.

Again, in the Reagan case, to which the Senator has referred, the language employed by the court was as follows:

> It is doubtless true, as a general proposition—

Now, observe the language of the court:

> It is doubtless true, as a general proposition, that the formation of a tariff of charges for the transportation by a common carrier of persons or property is a legislative or administrative, rather than a judicial, function.

So it is, "as a general proposition." But when the legislature decrees that all rates must be just and reasonable, may it not authorize the courts, when the question is properly presented, to determine what is the reasonable rate in the case at issue for the service in question, and would not that present a judicial question?

Indeed, in this very case of Reagan v. Farmers' Loan and Trust Company Mr. Justice Brewer qualified the quotation just made by saying:

> Yet it has always been recognized that if a carrier attempted to charge a shipper an unreasonable sum, the courts had jurisdiction to inquire into that matter and to award to the shipper any amount exacted from him in excess of a reasonable rate.

But, it may be said, the court in such case deals with a past transaction. True; but if the court may remedy a wrong perpetrated, may it not be empowered to restrain the same wrong threatened? And when the legislature has said that rates must be just and reasonable, may the courts not be authorized, when the shipper is threatened with unreasonable rates, to restrain the exaction thereof at the suit of the party in interest, and to ascertain and declare the reasonable rate? May not a commission be authorized to prosecute such suit in his behalf and in behalf of all others similarly interested? What provision of the Constitution would be violated by such a law? The legislature has declared that all rates must be reasonable. The question as to what is reasonable is confessedly a judicial question. Why may the court not determine it for the immediate future as well as for the past? That the Supreme Court did not intend to say that the court could not be authorized to establish by decree a future rate is manifest, for that court has practically exercised such power in numerous cases where it has, at the suit of the Interstate Commerce Commission, enjoined as unreasonable a rate established by a carrier. In so doing does the court not, in a degree, establish a maximum rate for the future? It enjoins exaction of the carrier's rate, and thereby prohibits it from charging that or a higher rate, and necessarily confines it to some leser rate for the future. Is not that, in effect, establishing a maximum rate? Might the court not, with equal propriety, logic, and reason, be authorized to determine just what would be the maximum reasonable rate for the future?

There is a very interesting case—I have it not here—to be found in the sixty-seventh of the Circuit Court of Appeals Reports, the case of the United States on the relation of the Kingwood Coal Company v. The West Virginia Northern Railroad Company and others. It is on page 220 of the report. In that case there were three coal mining companies occupying a certain district. The railroad company was not able to supply them all with sufficient cars to remove their output. Therefore it had adopted the practice of alloting so many cars, a certain percentage to this mine and a certain percentage to the other. The Kingwood Coal Company instituted suit, complaining that the allotment to it was unreasonable and unjust, because instead of being entitled to only 17 per cent at its disposal, it was entitled to 33⅓ per cent. It sued out a writ of mandamus to compel the company to give it its proportionate share, its just share. On the return of the writ the trial was had. The court found—Chief Justice Fuller, sitting on the circuit, announcing the opinion of the court—that the Kingwood Company was entitled to 31 per cent of the cars at the disposal of the company, and issued a peremptory writ compelling the railroad company to observe that order in the distribution thereafter.

If the court may determine just what percentage of cars at the disposal of a railroad company shall be furnished to a particular shipper in the future, can not the court say what the shipper should pay for the use of those cars in the future? Where is there any distinction? The order is operating in the future, the order is commanding the carrier to supply certain facilities in the future, specifying exactly what percentage of facilities at its disposal it shall supply. And yet you say the court is without power to fix the rate that shall be paid for those facilities. I do not believe that. I do not believe that that is either law or logic.

Now, another very interesting case——

Mr. BAILEY. Before the Senator passes from that I want to call his attention to this: It is almost impossible for the question to be presented to the court in the form he states it—that is, as to whether a given rate is reasonable. No rate can be attacked upon the ground that it is reasonable. It can only be attacked either by the shipper upon the ground that it is unreasonably high or by the carrier upon the ground that it is unreasonably low, and it is almost an impossibility, a legal impossibility, to get into the court with that question presented in any way except as to the unreasonableness of the given charge.

Mr. FULTON. Very good. The Senator will bear in mind that the amendment I have offered proposes that where the rate fixed by the Commission has been taken into court by the carrier and the court has adjudged that rate to be unreasonable and unjust as to the carrier the court shall then, instead of leaving it in the air, leaving it without any rate at all established by law or any competent authority, proceed to say what would be the reasonable rate. So it comes into court in just one of those cases the Senator from Texas suggests, and the question as to what is a reasonable rate will arise in that case.

That is to say, the case coming into court in that way, I propose that the law shall provide that the question at issue shall not only be, Is the rate prescribed by the Commission a just or an unjust rate? but if found to be an unjust and unreasonable rate, then What is a just and reasonable rate? That will be the issue in such case.

Mr. BAILEY. Then will the Senator tell us who are to provide the witnesses? Is the court to summon the witnesses on its own motion? Are the railroads to provide the witnesses to prove what is reasonable, or the shipper to provide them, or are we to leave the court to send its bailiff out into the highways and byways and bring men in who may have no particular interest either as shippers or as common carriers to provide the court with information upon which to base a judgment that is to affect people who are interested?

Now, waiving the question of the legality of that arrangement—I owe the Senator an apology for suggesting this practical difficulty—you confer upon the court in a controversy to which there are parties power to decide another question in which these parties might have no interest. And you leave the court then to find its own testimony and summon its own witnesses. That, however, is not a matter affecting the legality of the provision, but it struck me as rather a novel proceeding.

Mr. FULTON. Why does the Senator infer that that is left with the court? Why would not the Commission be required to furnish the witnesses on every point at issue? That would be one of the issues.

Mr. SPOONER. Will the Senator permit me a moment?

Mr. FULTON. Certainly.

Mr. SPOONER. I should like to ask my friend from Texas a question in connection with his interruption. Of course no court can be made to send, and the court will not send, for witnesses. The court has no such function. But I should like to put to my friend this question in the line of the contention of the Senator from Oregon. Suppose a rate is fixed by the Interstate Commerce Commission, and the order is made, and an act of Congress gives it effect. The railway carrier or carriers involved resort, as they have a right to do, to the appropriate circuit court of the United States for relief by way of injunction upon the contention that the rate fixed by the Commission is not justly remunerative, and is the taking of private property for public use without just compensation. Testimony in the case is taken. I assume that the subject is exhausted and that upon the record it is susceptible of determination, first, whether the rate fixed by the Commission is a confiscatory rate, and, second, what would be a reasonable rate which the carrier should be permitted to exact.

Now, the court will find, first, for that is a ground of equitable jurisdiction, whether the charge embodied in the Commission's order is confiscatory. Does the Senator from Texas contend that it is beyond the proper function of the court to go beyond that and upon the whole case decide what would be a reasonable rate, a justly remunerative rate?

I have been rather of the opinion of the Senator from Oregon in that respect and upon this well-settled principle of equity jurisprudence, based upon the distinction between the powers of the court of law and the powers of the court of chancery (and there are hundreds of illustrations of it) that when the court of chancery takes jurisdiction of the case it retains that jurisdiction, in order to guard against a multiplicity of suits and for other reasons, to do full and complete justice between the parties in this case, between the public on the one hand and the carrier or carriers on the other. That is my question, and I would like the Senator's opinion on it.

Mr. BAILEY rose.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Oregon yield to the Senator from Texas?

Mr. FULTON. I was going to ask the Senator from Texas if he would consider it discourteous if I should ask him to reply to the question after I have finished. I want to complete my remarks.

Mr. BAILEY. Not at all; I am perfectly willing to wait.

Mr. FULTON. I know the Senator will wish to reply to it at length.

Mr. BAILEY. Because there is the meat of the whole controversy. I will cheerfully yield to the Senator's wish.

Mr. FULTON. That opens up the entire question.

Mr. President, I was proceeding to say that it seems to me that the Supreme Court of the United States has practically settled this question already, and in conjunction with the suggestion of the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. SPOONER] that proposition is made clear. The United States Supreme Court has held, and nobody questions the jurisdiction of the court in that regard, that when a rate is charged to be unreasonable the court may inquire into that question on a proper issue, and if it finds the rate to be unreasonable it may enjoin its exaction in the future.

Mr. President, without reflecting on any Senator who holds a contrary opinion, it seems to me utterly absurd to contend that it is a judicial question and the court has power to say that a given rate is unreasonable and you must stop exacting it, and yet that the court is without authority to say what is reasonable and what you may exact.

Clearly the jurisdiction of the court does not depend upon whether the rate, the reasonableness of which it is required to determine, is for a service performed or to be performed. In either case, and equally in either case, when the question is, "What is a reasonable rate?" a judicial question is presented.

I am aware that there are numerous expressions to be found in the opinions of the courts, such as those I have quoted, stating in general terms that future rate making is a legislative and not a judicial power; but in every instance the court is speaking generally and has not in mind a litigated case where the parties are before the court, but is referring entirely to the exercise of the rate-making power by prescribing a schedule of rates to be observed generally by carriers in the future. Where such power is exercised by the legislature it is binding and obligatory on all carriers unless it can be shown to be unreasonable and unjust, and a party violating the law incurs the penalty. When established by the court in a litigated case it is binding only on the parties to the record.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Oregon yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. FULTON. Certainly.

Mr. HEYBURN. If the Senator will permit me to make a suggestion, is it not true that in every case that has been before the Supreme Court in which they have declined to consider the question of what was a reasonable rate they have based their opinion on the ground that the issue was not presented to them by the pleadings?

Mr. FULTON. Manifestly so.

Mr. HEYBURN. Has it not been upon the pleadings in every case?

Mr. FULTON. As I have said, in the Reagan case the entire schedule of rates had been challenged, and there was no issue as to what was a reasonable rate; it was simply contended that the rates prescribed by the Commission were unreasonable and unjust and confiscatory in their character and effect. The court upheld that contention, and, as that was the only issue, enjoined enforcement of the schedule. I do not know whether without some legislation on the subject a court would take jurisdiction at the present time to determine what is a reasonable rate for the future when the existing rate is attacked as being unreasonable. I do not know that a court will do that; I do not say that the court will, but I do say that Congress is clothed with power to vest that jurisdiction in the court.

Mr. HEYBURN. If it would not disturb the Senator——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Oregon yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. FULTON. Certainly.

Mr. HEYBURN. Has the court ever intimated that it would not consider the question were it presented in the pleadings? For instance, where a party complaining that an unjust charge has been made states that a charge in excess of a given amount named in the pleading would be unfair and asks for relief against that situation, has not the Supreme Court intimated in its decisions that if that issue were presented it would consider the question and determine it?

Mr. FULTON. In the Supreme Court of the United States the question has never been presented as to what is a reasonable rate in the future. No one has ever sought to have the court determine that question so far as I am advised. The only case where that question has been presented to my knowledge is in the case of Janvrin in 174 Massachusetts Reports, 514. It is a very instructive and interesting case, and it is a very strong case in support of the contention of the Senator from Ohio. In the Janvrin case the facts were these: Under the statute of Massachusetts the selectmen of the town or any patron might apply to the court of general jurisdiction at stated times to have the court fix the rates of water, for the future, mind you, and the rates being fixed, they were to remain in force for a certain period of time, I think five years; but that is immaterial. Janvrin filed his petition in the court asking the court to revise the water rates of the defendant company, the Revere Water Company. I will read a brief extract from the decision of the court in that case:

The statute goes upon the footing that every taker of water from the companies in question has a right to be furnished with water at a reasonable rate.

And that is the law in regard to rates of railroads and other carriers.

No one questions the power of the legislature to require these water companies to furnish water to the takers at reasonable rates (Attorney-General v. Old Colony Railroad, 160 Mass., 62, 86, 87; Spring Valley Water Works v. Schottler, 110 U. S., 347, 354; Budd v. New York, 143 U. S., 517, 537, 549, 552), and this statute does require the companies to do so, and thereby gives to water takers a corresponding right, or declares that they have it. It is with the relations between actual water takers and the companies that the statute calls on this court to deal. It does not undertake merely to make of the court a commission to determine what rule shall govern people who are not yet in relation to each other, and who may elect to enter or not to enter into relations as they may or may not like the rule which we lay down; it calls on us to fix the extent of actually existing rights. With regard to such rights judicial determinations are not confined to the past. If it legitimately might be left to this court to decide whether a bill for water furnished was reasonable, and, if not, to cut it down to a reasonable sum, it equally may be left to the court to enjoin a company from charging more than a reasonable sum in the immediate future.

Is not the same argument applicable to carrier's rates?

There can be no distinction in principle. That case was decided by the supreme court of the State of Massachusetts, one of the highest authorities we have, but the authority of this case is emphasized by the fact that the opinion was announced by Mr. Justice Holmes, who now sits in the Supreme Court of the United States, but who was then a member of the Massachusetts court.

It is true that in Reagan—

And he shows, kindly observe, that in the Reagan case the question as to what was the reasonable charge was not in issue—

It is true that in Reagan v. Farmers' Loan and Trust Company it was said also that "it is not the function of the courts to establish a schedule of rates" (154 U. S., 400), and to that proposition we fully agree. But it will be observed that the proposition is laid down in connection with the statement that "the challenge in this case is of the tariff as a whole and not of any particular rate upon any single class of goods." Probably to prepare a new schedule or to rearrange the old one would have gone beyond the scope of the rights immediately affected or threatened in the case before the court into the realm of abstract lawmaking for the future, and so beyond the power of the court.

And that is the proposition. Are rights immediately threatened before the court? If so, the court has power and jurisdiction to restrain the threatened injury, and it is a judicial question for the court to determine. But where there is a whole schedule of rates pending before the court it seldom could be said that a single individual's property or rights are immediately threatened by that entire schedule.

Mr. KNOX. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Oregon yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania?

Mr. FULTON. Certainly.

Mr. KNOX. May I ask just a question?

Mr. FULTON. Certainly.

Mr. KNOX. Is it the contention of the Senator from Oregon that the rule as to the separation of powers is the same under the Constitution of the United States that it is under the constitution of Massachusetts, or, upon the contrary, is it not different to a large extent under the constitutions of the various States themselves?

Mr. FULTON. I have not examined the constitution of Massachusetts, but I do not think——

Mr. FORAKER. Will the Senator from Oregon allow me?

Mr. FULTON. Just a second and then I will yield to the Senator from Ohio.

I think, as a general rule, the constitutions of the several States divide and separate the governmental powers very similarly to the manner in which they are divided and distributed under the Constitution of the United States. Generally I think the constitutions say, in substance, that the legislative power is vested in a legislature, composed so and so, and the judicial power is vested in a supreme court and certain subordinate courts, and so forth. I think that is generally the distribution of power. In Massachusetts it may be different. I have not examined the constitution of Massachusetts, but I call the Senator's attention to the fact that Justice Holmes does not distinguish the doctrine in the Reagan case on the ground that the constitutional powers of that court differ from the constitutional powers of the Supreme Court of the United States. Now I yield to the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. FORAKER. I meant to call the Senator's attention to what he has just referred to—first, that the supreme court of Massachusetts does not put its decision upon anything peculiar to the constitution of Massachusetts, but that, on the contrary, it cites the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States in support of the proposition it decides.

Mr. FULTON. It differentiates.

Mr. FORAKER. When it comes to that it will be very instructive to show what the different constitutions of the States do provide. In every case that has come to the Supreme Court the distinction is made either in the statute or in the constitution of the State that authorizes the kind of decision that is relied upon to support this general proposition.

Mr. KNOX. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Oregon yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania?

Mr. FULTON. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. KNOX. Only one more word along the line of what has been discussed. It is an interesting question and it is very important in relation to the subject-matter that is before the Senate. There is, in my judgment, a very wide distinction between the various constitutions of the Commonwealths that form this Union and the Constitution of the United States as to the separation of powers. I will use just one illustration, which I think will make very clear what my point is. Take the matter of granting divorces. There are States in the United States that are wholly free from constitutional provision upon the subject. It has been held in some that the legislature may not grant a divorce because the granting of a divorce is a judicial act and the legislature can not perform that judicial function. On the other hand, there are States where without any constitutional provision to that effect legislatures grant divorces, as formerly in the State of Pennsylvania before the existing constitution went into effect. This illustrates that you can not claim that the extent of the separation of the powers under the Constitution of the United States can be determined by the decisions of the States.

Mr. FULTON. I agree with the Senator on that proposition. It depends, of course, upon the provision of the constitution of the particular State as it affects the question under consideration; but, while that is true, I do not think that the Massachusetts court based its decision on any peculiar provision of the State constitution or suggested any difference between its provisions and the provisions of the Federal Constitution in the matter of judicial power in determining this case.

Mr. KNOX. It did not have to.

Mr. FULTON. No; it did not have to. They distinguished the Reagan case from the case at bar—from the case that they were deciding. They go on to say:

Probably to prepare a new schedule or to rearrange the old one would have gone beyond the scope of the rights immediately affected or threatened in the case before the court into the realm of abstract lawmaking for the future, and so beyond the power of the court; and, if it had not been beyond the court's power, still very possibly it might have been refused in the court's discretion, the court leaving it to the proper body to undertake that task. But it is implied that if the challenge had been of a single rate threatened to be charged for a service demanded the court might have determined the question between the parties for the immediate future, as it is stated three pages earlier that the court would determine it with regard to a charge for past services. When you are prepared to say that a given charge is too high or too low, it hardly would be consistent to say that you had not power or ability to say what is a proper charge.

So I contend that when you admit that the court may determine that a charge is too high, and hence is unreasonable for the shipper, or a charge is too low, and hence is confiscatory as to the carrier, it is unreasonable in the extreme to say that the court can not also determine what a reasonable charge is. Wherein is the distinction? Wherein does the court exercise a different power in one case than in the other? Wherein does the court exercise legislative power in determining what is a reasonable rate in the future if it does not exercise legislative power in determining what is unreasonable?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. A bill (S. 529) to promote the national defense, to create a naval reserve, to establish American ocean mail lines to foreign markets, to promote commerce, and to provide revenue from tonnage.

Mr. GALLINGER. I will ask the Senator from Oregon how much more time he desires to occupy?

Mr. FULTON. I will conclude. Mr. President, I will say to the Senate that I had not intended to take up anything like this amount of time. Indeed, I think most Senators will bear witness that I have not taken up anything like this amount of time.

Mr. GALLINGER. I ask unanimous consent that the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside until the Senator concludes his remarks.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from New Hampshire asks unanimous consent that the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside until the Senator from Oregon concludes his remarks. Is there objection? The Chair hears none. The Senator from Oregon will proceed.

Mr. FULTON. Mr. President, I shall not detain the Senate longer. I have, by reason of the suggestions of Senators, which I am very glad indeed to have had, been driven to speak along somewhat different lines than I had contemplated when I started out. I had intended only to speak about fifteen minutes to explain my position on one phase of this question. But the various questions and suggestions practically opened up the entire subject, which I did not contemplate discussing.

Mr. FORAKER. Mr. President——

Mr. FULTON. Did the Senator wish to interrupt me?

Mr. FORAKER. I wish to ask the Senator a question before he concludes.

Mr. FULTON. I would be glad to have the Senator ask it now.

Mr. FORAKER. The Senator has made a very able and interesting argument, the purpose of it being, as he states—and I think he has accomplished his purpose very clearly—to show that it is a judicial function to inquire what is a reasonable and just rate and then to administer relief. The question I want to ask him is a practical one, having reference to the legislation that is soon to be under consideration in this body.

If it be, as I think he has made it clear it is, a judicial function, why should not that judicial function be exercised in the first instance? By that question I mean this, if I may go into detail for a moment, so he will be entirely possessed of what is in my mind: Why should there be a complaint before the Commission and a full hearing, to use the language employed in all of these bills, before the Commission, which, according to custom, has occupied usually from one to two and even three and four years, to enable the Commission to determine whether a challenged rate should be condemned and then what rate it should substitute, and then after that go into the court? Why not go into court in the first instance? Why not make the complaint before the Commission and then let the Commission order the case tried before a court that can ascertain and can administer relief?

Mr. FULTON. I will state the reason why I prefer the Commission. In the first place, I do not think that the rate established by the court in a given case can be binding on persons who are not parties to the record.

Mr. FORAKER. On that point it is easy to provide, is it not, as I have already suggested, and as has been provided in at least one bill that is pending here, that the suit shall be brought in the name of the Government on the complaint of the Commission on behalf of all who are interested, being in its nature——

Mr. FULTON. I do not desire at this time to discuss that question. I only say I have doubts on that point. But the main proposition with me is this, Mr. President: I think a commission will handle the work better. It will deal summarily with a great many complaints, dispose of them expeditiously, and, perhaps, 75 per cent of the cases that come before the Commission will never be carried to the court.

Mr. CLAY. Will the Senator allow me to ask a question in connection with what he has just stated?

Mr. FULTON. Certainly.

Mr. CLAY. I understood the Senator to say that he is in favor of this question going to the Interstate Commerce Commission in the first instance——

Mr. FULTON. Yes.

Mr. CLAY. Because the Interstate Commerce Commission deals with facts, learns the value of railroad property and of profits, how much the railroads are making, and what would be a reasonable and just rate better than the courts, and for that reason the Interstate Commerce Commission ought to deal with it in the first instance. I will ask the Senator is it not true that the citizen can go before the Commission with much less expense and present his case? The Commission often hears facts without the citizen or the shipper being present. It takes the case up and considers it and finds out what was a reasonable and just rate. I ask the Senator is it not true that the Interstate Commerce Commission devotes its time to that business, looking into the earnings and operations of roads, and could it not better determine what would be a reasonable rate than the court could determine?

Mr. FULTON. That is the impression I have had. That is the view I take.

Mr. FORAKER. Will the Senator allow me to make one suggestion in answer to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. FULTON. I will yield the floor to the Senator in a second.

Mr. FORAKER. What I wanted to say is in answer to the Senator from Georgia, and I will state it now or after the Senator concludes.

Mr. GALLINGER. The Senator had better ask the question now. The unfinished business will soon be taken up.

Mr. FORAKER. I am told the unfinished business will be taken up in a minute, and so I will ask the question now.

Mr. FULTON. Very well.

Mr. FORAKER. The Senator from Georgia says that it is less expensive to go before the Commission than it is to go before the courts. That may be as the law now stands, but it is not proposed by those who think that all these remedies can be worked out in the courts that the law shall stand as it is. On the contrary, the proposition is, looking to the public nature of all this controversy, that the suits shall be at the instance of the Commission, in the name of the Government and at the expense of the Government, except where the railroad is found to be at fault and then at the expense of the railroad.

Now, that leads me to make a remark here. The great difficulty that the shippers of this country are having to secure their rights under the law is in the fact that they have to go before the Commission or into the courts to fight these great railroads single-handed and alone. And yet every order that is made is not alone for himself, but for the whole community in which he lives, for a thousand shippers, perhaps.

Mr. BAILEY. Will the Senator from Ohio permit me to ask him a question, with the permission of the Senator from Oregon?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Oregon yield?

Mr. FULTON. Certainly.

Mr. BAILEY. Suppose the Government intitutes a suit such as the Senator proposed, and suppose there is a decree and afterwards my rights become involved, does the Senator believe this decree to which I was not a party can bind me and that this judgment could be pleaded against any redress that I sought in the courts?

Mr. FORAKER. Does the Senator question the right of Congress to authorize a suit by and on behalf of the public in any case where the public interest is affected? Is it not as common a proceeding as you can think of under the statutes of all the States that a taxpayer may bring a suit in his capacity as a taxpayer on behalf of all the public and bind all the public?

Mr. BAILEY. No; it can not bind all the public. It binds, when it is a proceeding in rem, everybody with respect to the thing in controversy; but it will be a new and, I believe, a dangerous doctrine in this country that a man can have his rights concluded in the courts without an opportunity to be heard in defense or in assertion of them. I for one will never agree that the humblest citizen shall have his rights concluded and determined without an opportunity to be heard in the courts.

Mr. FORAKER. Mr. President——

Mr. FULTON. If the Senator will allow me to conclude I will sit down.

Mr. FORAKER. I beg the Senator's pardon. I will speak at another time.

Mr. FULTON. I am working now to reach a point where I can quit. I had determined to quit some time ago.

I simply want to call attention to this, that in the amendment I have offered I am not proposing by the decree of the court to bind the public or the world at large. I am simply proposing that when the court has jurisdiction of the question and the parties for the purpose of determining whether or not the rate established by the Commission is reasonable or unreasonable, and the court holds it to be unreasonable and therefore condemns the rate and enjoins its enforcement, the court shall be authorized to say what is a reasonable rate and then refer it back to the Commission, and the Commission pursuant to the mandate of the law, not of the court, shall adopt that rate. It can change it afterwards and fix any other rate.

Now then, just one other suggestion in connection with that and I will close. I assume from suggestions that some Senators have made that they believe that would be in contravention of the Constitution. I do not believe it is; but even if the court should hold the power to be in contravention of the Constitution it will not affect any other portion of this bill if it shall be passed, because it will be a provision that will stand alone, and if it should go down it would leave the other provisions of the law unaffected. Therefore it is not dangerous legislation in any event, and if sustained, as I am confident it will be, it is surely very desirable legislation.

POTOMAC RIVER MEMORIAL BRIDGE.

Mr. GALLINGER. I ask that the unfinished business be laid before the Senate.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, which is Senate bill 529.

Mr. DANIEL. I ask the Senator to yield to me a few moments, that I may call up the memorial bridge bill, which I believe will elicit no debate.

Mr. GALLINGER. I understand the Senator from Virginia has been very diligently for two days seeking an opportunity to ask consideration for his bill. I will say to the Senator that if it does not lead to debate I will gladly yield to him for that purpose.

Mr. DANIEL. I apprehend not, sir.

I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 1373) to provide for the construction of a memorial bridge across the Potomac River from Washington to the Arlington estate property.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Virginia offers amendments, which will be stated in their order.

The SECRETARY. On page 1, line 5, strike out "of" and insert in lieu thereof the words "upon or near;" on page 1, line 5, after the word "the," insert the word "Old;" on page 1, lines 5 and 6, strike out the words "or adjacent thereto;" so as to read:

That the Secretary of War is hereby authorized and directed to cause to be constructed a memorial bridge from the most convenient point upon or near the Old Naval Observatory grounds, etc.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BAILEY. Will the Senator from Virginia and the Senator from New Hampshire regard it as against the spirit of this understanding if I should on this bill speak five or ten minutes to reply to the inquiry addressed to me by the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. SPOONER] a moment ago?

Mr. GALLINGER. I will pass it over to my friend the Senator from Virginia. I will not object.

Mr. DANIEL. It would be better to let the bill go through before the Senator makes his remarks.

Mr. GALLINGER. Perhaps it would be better to let the bill be acted upon, I will say to the Senator.

Mr. BAILEY. Very well. I want to get in on this bill. Something might happen that would cut off the opportunity.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The next amendment proposed by the Senator from Virginia [Mr. DANIEL] will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 1, line 7, strike out "of" and insert "upon or near;" so as to read:

Across the Potomac River to the most convenient point upon or near the Arlington estate property; the said bridge to be constructed on a plan to be approved by a board composed of the Secretary of War, etc.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. KEAN. How much money is there in this bill?

Mr. DANIEL. Five hundred thousand dollars.

Mr. KEAN. Is that for the completion of the bridge?

Mr. DANIEL. No, sir; for the purpose of securing and determining on a proper plan and to commence the construction of the memorial bridge.

Mr. KEAN. This is the commencement?

Mr. DANIEL. The commencement.

Mr. GALLINGER. I think, if the Senator from Virginia will permit me, the full amount proposed to be appropriated is about $5,000,000, is it not?

Mr. DANIEL. There is no telling about that. One can never tell.

Mr. GALLINGER. In the former bills I think that amount was named.

Mr. DANIEL. It will take a large amount of money before we get through with it.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment proposed by the Committee on the District of Columbia will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 1, lines 9 and 10, strike out the words "President pro tempore of the Senate" and insert the word "Vice-President."

Mr. DANIEL. That is a mere formal amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President——

Mr. GALLINGER. I suggest to the Senator from Texas that it will take but a moment to pass the bill.

Mr. BAILEY. I am not going to interfere. I apprehend that such an answer as I might make to the inquiry propounded by the Senator from Wisconsin would probably lead to an exchange of views and that would occupy a longer time than the good nature of the Senator from New Hampshire would indulge. With that understanding I will not interfere with the passage of this measure about which the Senator from Virginia is so much concerned. I will seek such opportunity as time offers to-morrow to make such answer as I can to the question of the Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. SPOONER. Mr. President, I owe the Senator from Texas an apology for having put a question to him after he had taken his seat, forgetting that he was not holding the floor in his own right.

Mr. BAILEY. No; I do not feel that way about it, because the Senator from Oregon [Mr. FULTON] was good enough to have yielded if I had insisted on it.

The inquiry propounded by the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. SPOONER] is a very important one, and probably he assumed too much when he supposed I could answer it in five or ten minutes. It is, however, absolutely certain if we can answer that question we answer the whole case; and if we can not answer it a majority of Senators on that side, as it now appears, will be for that method of dealing with this question. Speaking for myself, I want an effective method; and when we turn from the question of power in Congress to the one of mere detail, I think the argument there will be with us. But before we reach that we must, of course, dispose of the other; and that I shall attempt to do at some more convenient time.

Mr. MCCUMBER. Mr. President, under the agreement upon which the bill was allowed to come up I do not want to ask the Senator from Virginia [Mr. DANIEL] to go into a very lengthy discussion of it, but I should like to ask the Senator to give the Senate some good reason why, while we are running the Government with a deficit of from twenty to forty million dollars; while we are compelled to economize in the matter of needed public buildings, the want of which is requiring the payment of many millions of dollars per year for rent; while we are being compelled to economize in our rivers and harbors and being compelled to economize in a thousand other things which ought to be considered as almost necessary for the benefit and uses of the Government, we should at the present time spend a million dollars for a memorial bridge, which might be a thing of beauty and something beneficial, something in which we could have a great deal of pride in the future, yet at the same time which would subserve very little interest. I simply suggest that in this period of great economy we ought to consider the necessary things for the Government before we spend a million dollars or any such sum for a merely memorial bridge.

Mr. DANIEL. Mr. President, I shall only take two minutes, with the kind permission of my friend from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER].

Mr. GALLINGER. I am glad to yield to the Senator.

Mr. DANIEL. Mr. President, this bill recognizes the situation, and is consequently a very economical bill. This is not a mere ornamentation that is proposed to be put in the city of Washington, but a necessary highway for troops and for people. It has been recommended by the Secretary of War and by the President of the United States time and again, and urged upon Congress as a matter of military convenience between the capital and Fort Myer. It would accommodate the passage of a great many people and a great deal of transportation across the Potomac River.

If the Senator's idea were to be carried out, we would have to stop improving the streets of Washington. There is no large expenditure proposed here in comparison with the work in contemplation. A fitting bridge can not be put across so broad a river as the Potomac for such purposes and of permanence, as contemplated in this bill, for a very small sum of money. That is the condition.

Mr. MCCUMBER. I wish to say, Mr. President, that I am not assuming that the proposed bridge is to be wholly ornamental and of no use whatever, but the point I desire to make is that there are many things that we need which we can not have which are much more important than this bridge, either in usefulness or for any other purpose.

Mr. DANIEL. Mr. President, the Senate has time and again passed its judgment on this measure. I am under such constraint as to the situation that I should not like to enlarge upon the merits of the measure, as I might under different circumstances; but I hardly think that we are quite so hard up as not to make reasonable and economical progress in our own domestic concerns. It is true we ought to have our eye to economy, and I am in favor of that, and in other matters than this I will endeavor to assist the Senator in any good undertaking of an economical description. I think we are sufficiently economical here. We do not spend a million dollars—the Senator doubled the amount of the appropriation when he cautioned us, but we had already recognized his caution by making the appropriation half of what he imagined it to be.

I think if we will go through the rest of our business with as much caution as has been taken with respect to this measure, one that has long waited and been for many years recommended, we shall get through pretty safely with our financial concerns.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, if the Senator will permit me a moment, I will simply add that similar bills for this purpose have been before the Committee on the District of Columbia for at least ten years, and without a dissenting voice or vote they have always been favorably reported, and have passed the Senate three or four times. I hope, Mr. President, the bill will receive the approval of the Senate to-day.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

THE MERCHANT MARINE.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed consideration of the bill (S. 529) to promote the national defense, to create a naval reserve, to establish American ocean mail lines to foreign markets, to promote commerce, and to provide revenue from tonnage.

Mr. GALLINGER. Now, Mr. President, I will ask the Senator from Florida [Mr. MALLORY] if he is ready to proceed to-day in the discussion of the unfinished business?

Mr. MALLORY. Mr. President, I had intended to address the Senate to-day on this bill, but find that I am not in a position to do so. I shall, therefore, be compelled to withhold my remarks until to-morrow.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I desire simply to say that, in the opinion of some of us, the bill that is under consideration is a very important measure, and while I know the futility of undertaking to hasten a measure through this body to which there is opposition, I yet feel that it is my privilege to suggest to Senators on both sides of the Chamber that, in view of the fact that other very important business will soon be pressing for consideration at our hands, I trust as much expedition as possible may be made in discussing this measure and reaching a conclusion upon it.

I understand the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. SCOTT] is prepared to speak to-day, and I apprehend that at the conclusion of his remarks the matter will have to be passed over until to-morrow.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. President, I shall only detain the Senate for a few moments. Representing, as I do, a State that is not bordered on any side by the ocean, I think that I may fairly be considered as being entirely unbiased in anything that I may offer in regard to this bill.

Mr. President, notwithstanding the history of shipbuilding and the ship carrying trade of the last century, this is still an infant industry and should be protected as other industries have been. The result of protection in all cases has been to put the United States to the front in every direction.

I might illustrate by taking, for example, the line of goods that I have manufactured for the past thirty-five or forty years.

Before we had any protection on glass at all we used to pay a glass blower for ten or twelve hours' work on an average of $1 a day, and the price then of an ordinary tumbler or goblet was from $1.50 to $2.50 per dozen for the so-called "pressed" or cheap article. When the Government in its wisdom gave us a protection of 40 per cent on pressed ware to protect us from the cheap labor of Europe, the result was what? The workman immediately received at least $2 for four and one-half hours' work where he formerly received $1 for ten or twelve hours' work, and the consumer had the advantage of buying the same goblet or tumbler for which he had formerly paid $2.50, when there was no protection, at from 40 to 50 cents per dozen. The protection of 40 per cent on an infant industry, as the glass business was then, enabled us to go ahead, enlarge our works, improve the method of making, introduce new devices and labor-saving machines, and brought about this wonderful reduction in the price of the article to the consumer and at the same time the increase in wages to the workman.

I have no doubt, Mr. President, if we would protect our shipping industry, as we have other infant industries, until large shipyards could be built up with modern machinery and all the latest labor-saving devices, then in a short time the price of the production of a ship or ships would be materially reduced, and at the same time, basing my calculation on the theory that it would work out as it did in my own business, the wages now paid to that class of workmen would be largely increased.

Since I desire to speak only for a few minutes, it is needless for me to enter into the rise and fall of the American marine. The history of our country shows that during the early part of the last century, when Congress passed laws aiding shipbuilding, American ships were numerous and found on every sea. The building of ships was a thriving industry, but the civil war broke this up entirely. After that struggle foreign nations took advantage of the situation, offered very large subsidies to shipbuilders, and, as a consequence, the export trade of the United States is to-day carried in foreign vessels. At the end of this war our people had their money invested in other lines, and had as much attention been paid at that time to protecting the industry of shipbuilding as was given to other interests, American ships would to-day be carrying American exports in all the seas of the world.

The object lesson given by foreign countries in subsidizing steamship lines should open the eyes of every American, in my opinion, to the necessity of protection for home shipbuilding. If the carrying trade of the world is worth so much that foreign countries can pay subsidies, why is not the trade of the world worth something to the United States? Especially is this true when we remember the large amount of exports carried from the United States. Dun's International Review shows that the total foreign trade of the United States during last November was valued, in round numbers, at $269,000,000, and that exports exceeded imports by, in round numbers, $72,000,000. Is not the carrying of this trade of value to us? And yet all of it was carried in foreign vessels.

The building of ships to carry this wonderful trade would directly be of great benefit to the nation, and indirectly the building of American ships by Americans would mean a great deal for the common good of all. Ores, iron, timber, and all of the various articles that go to make up ships are produced in this country, and would be used in their building. The ores would come from the lake regions, the iron would come from our great iron centers, the coal would come from West Virginia, Pennsylvania, and the other various coal-producing States, and the wood would come from our forests. The ore miner, the ironworker, the coal digger, the lumberman, and the railroad carrier all would directly profit from the establishment of this industry; and while the ships were building, as well as after they were built, the farmer and the gardener would have to furnish the provisions. Indirectly these classes of men who would profit in this way must live, and the money so obtained would be placed in circulation. So this single industry, properly protected, would send its benefits into almost every home in the United States.

To produce the results mentioned above a subsidy is needed to make up for the difference in the cost of construction between a foreign ship and an American-made ship. In the United States workmen are paid more than abroad, and this adds largely to the cost of construction. A subsidy is also needed to make up for the difference in the cost of operation. The American sailor is paid better wages, lives better, and requires more than the sailor of any other country. Meeting the cost of construction and the cost of operation, the American ship could enter into competition for the carrying trade of the world. On the other hand, if we would reduce the price paid to the American ship carpenter to the level of the poorly paid and pauper laborer of Europe, the American shipowner then could compete successfully with other shipping industries of the world. But do we want to reduce the standard of wages which our laborers receive to the standard of that paid in European countries? Yet we must equalize it in some way, and the only way, in my mind, to do this is by giving protection in some way to American-built and American-sailed ships.

A final argument, but to my mind not the least, would be the doing away with the great trouble in finding sailors to man our war vessels. As every Senator knows, this trouble exists to-day. If our Navy were called into actual conflict, we would have trouble in manning our vessels. Why? Because we have no large shipping industries. With a large American marine, drawing its crews from American manhood, the life of a sailor would again become a popular one, and the trouble of finding sailors for our war vessels would entirely disappear.

Many more reasons, Mr. President, might be given in support of this bill, but I simply want to place myself on record as favoring it, and will content myself with these few brief remarks.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President——

Mr. MALLORY. Is the Senator from Idaho going to address the Senate on the shipping bill?

Mr. HEYBURN. No; and I understood the Senator from Florida was going to defer his address on that bill until to-morrow.

Mr. MALLORY. I do not intend to speak now on the bill. I was going to ask that it be temporarily laid aside.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. GALLINGER in the chair). The Senator from Florida asks unanimous consent that the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside. Without objection, it will be so ordered.

PURE-FOOD BILL.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate bill 88.

Mr. NELSON. Will the Senator yield to me for the purpose of having passed a local bill? It will take but a moment.

Mr. HEYBURN. After the pure-food bill is taken up I will yield to the Senator.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Idaho asks unanimous consent that the Senate proceed to the consideration of a bill, the title of which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. A bill (S. 88) for preventing the manufacture, sale, or transportation of adulterated or misbranded or poisonous or deleterious foods, drugs, medicines, and liquors, and for regulating traffic therein, and for other purposes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Idaho? The Chair hears none, and the bill is before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. HEYBURN. Certainly.

CHIPPEWA INDIANS IN MINNESOTA.

Mr. NELSON. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 2397) to amend an act entitled "An act to amend an act entitled 'An act for the relief and civilization of the Chippewa Indians in the State of Minnesota,' approved January 14, 1889," so as to create a State forest reserve, and for other purposes.

The Secretary read the bill; and by unanimous consent the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Indian Affairs with an amendment, in section 1, page 2, line 5, after the words "Cass Lake," to insert:

Composed of the following described pieces of land situate in the State of Minnesota, to wit, lots 1 and 2 of section 25; lot 1 of section 26; the southeast quarter of the southeast quarter and lots 5 and 6 of section 27; lots 1, 2, 3, and 4 of section 34; the west half of the northwest quarter, the northwest quarter of the southwest quarter, the southeast quarter of the southwest quarter, and lots 1, 2, 3, 4, 5, 6, 7, and 8 of section 35; lots 1, 2, 3, and 4 of section 36; all in township 146 north, range 31 west; also lot 1 of section 1; lots 1, 2, 3, and 4 of section 2, of township 145 north, range 31 west.

So as to make the section read:

That section 5 of an act entitled "An act for the relief and civilization of the Chippewa Indians in the State of Minnesota," as amended by the act of Congress approved on the 27th day of June, 1902, entitled "An act to amend an act entitled 'An act for the relief and civilization of the Chippewa Indians in the State of Minnesota,' approved January 14, 1889," is hereby amended in line 92 by inserting after the word "lakes" the words "excepting Cooper Island in Cass Lake," and in line 94, after the word "Interior," by inserting the sentence "And Cooper Island in Cass Lake, composed of the following-described pieces of land situate in the State of Minnesota, to wit, lots 1 and 2 of section 25; lot 1 of section 26; the southeast quarter of the southeast quarter and lots 5 and 6 of section 27; lots 1, 2, 3, and 4 of section 34; the west half of the northwest quarter, the northwest quarter of the southwest quarter, the southeast quarter of the southwest quarter, and lots 1, 2, 3, 4, 5, 6, 7, and 8 of section 35; lots 1, 2, 3, and 4 of section 36; all in township 146 north, range 31 west; also lot 1 of section 1; lots 1, 2, 3, and 4 of section 2, of township 145 north, range 31 west, is hereby reserved for and granted to the State of Minnesota, to be used as a State forest reserve or public park, upon condition that if at any time the State shall cease to use the said island so reserved and granted for forest reserve or park purposes the title to the same shall be forfeited and shall revert to the United States."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PURE-FOOD BILL.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed consideration of the bill (S. 88) for preventing the manufacture, sale, or transportation of adulterated or misbranded or poisonous or deleterious foods, drugs, medicines, and liquors, and for regulating traffic therein, and for other purposes.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, the matter that has been taken up by the Senate is one of more than passing importance, and I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Idaho suggests the absence of a quorum. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Alger	Dolliver	Heyburn	Piles
Allee	Dubois	Kean	Rayner
Allison	Elkins	Latimer	Scott
Bacon	Flint	Lodge	Spooner
Burnham	Foraker	Long	Sutherland
Clark, Mont.	Frazier	McCreary	Teller
Clark, Wyo.	Frye	McCumber	Tillman
Clay	Fulton	Nelson	Warner
Crane	Gallinger	Overman	Warren
Culberson	Gamble	Patterson	Wetmore
Daniel	Hale	Perkins
Dick	Hansbrough	Pettus

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Forty-six Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present.

Mr. HEYBURN. I ask that certain amendments shall be taken up and disposed of.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendments will be stated in their order.

The SECRETARY. The Committee on Manufactures report, in section 2, page 3, line 13, after the word "personally," to insert "responsible for such violation;" so as to read:

That in the case of any violation of the provisions of the foregoing two sections by any corporation, the fines and penalties imposed therefore may be enforced against the officers of such corporation personally responsible for such violation, etc.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 2, page 3, line 15, before "officer," to strike out the word "each" and insert "the;" so as to read:

and any violation of any of the provisions of this act by any corporation shall be deemed to be the act of the officer of such corporation, etc.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 2, page 3, line 16, after the word "corporation," to insert the words "directly responsible therefor;" so as to read:

the officer of such corporation directly responsible therefor, and such officer may be punished for such violation as though such violation was the personal act of such officer.

The amendment was agreed to.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Those are all the committee amendments.

Mr. HEYBURN. There are certain other amendments which have been offered other than committee amendments.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The first is the amendment offered by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE].

The SECRETARY. On page 8, at the end of line 9——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Are there further amendments?

Mr. McCUMBER. I should like to know what was done with that amendment.

Mr. HEYBURN. I did not understand it.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair understands that it has not been formally offered from the floor. It was submitted to be printed.

Mr. HEYBURN. I understand the amendments offered by the Senator from Massachusetts, three of them, have been printed and that they are on the table for consideration.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. They have been printed and are on the table, but the Senator has not offered them. They are proposed amendments at the present stage.

Mr. HEYBURN. The Senator from Massachusetts is not present. I desire to proceed with this measure, and if no Senator wishes to discuss it further I desire that we shall proceed to dispose of the proposed amendments and dispose of the bill.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair will entertain the amendments if they are offered by any Senator from the floor.

Mr. HEYBURN. I do not want the Senator from Massachusetts to be treated in a discourteous manner, but I do not know that anyone can speak for him, he having offered the amendments and not being present, although he was in the Chamber a moment ago.

Mr. ALLISON. Let the amendments be read and let us see what they are.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendments will be read for the information of the Senate. The first amendment proposed by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] will be stated.

The SECRETARY. In section 9, page 8, of the bill, at the end of line 9, after the word "preparation," insert the following additional proviso:

Provided further, That when in the preparation of food products for shipment they are preserved by an external application applied in such manner that the preservative is necessarily removed mechanically or by maceration in water or otherwise, the provisions of this act shall be construed as applying only when said products are ready for consumption.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, the provision covered by that amendment is already in the bill in sufficient form, in the judgment of the committee.

Mr. McCUMBER. I wish to say a word so that there may be no mistake about the matter. It is in the bill so far as it relates to exports.

Mr. ALLISON. Where is it in the bill?

Mr. McCUMBER. On page 8, beginning in line 3; and it reads as follows:

Provided, That goods intended for export shall not be deemed misbranded or adulterated when prepared and packed in accordance with specifications of the foreign purchaser, provided no substance is used that is in conflict with the laws of the country to which the goods are to be shipped, when such country having laws upon the subject does not prohibit such process of preparation.

The amendment itself is not in the bill, but the point to which the amendment is directed is covered by the bill so far as it relates to exports. I understand from the author of the bill, in a short discussion concerning the provision that it was intended to cover the matter of packing meats in borax. That is a thing that it is said can be washed off and that it does not permeate the hams. They are packed and covered with borax, and the packing industries of the country, I understand, desire that that provision be retained in the bill.

Now, why was the provision placed in the bill so far as exports are concerned? Most of the hams that are shipped out of this country are shipped to Great Britain. There is no prohibition in the food laws of Great Britain against the use of borax as a packing ingredient. In addition to that, the orders for the most part, as I am informed, which come from Great Britain, request that the hams be packed in borax, for the reason that this particular process protects the goods in transit across the water. To meet that condition we provided that the meats might be packed in accordance with the request of foreign consumers to meet the requirements of that demand.

That might bring up the question as to whether the packing in borax is necessarily deleterious. That would be a question under the bill, of course, for the courts to determine, if the bill should become a law. I can only cite the report made by the food commissioner of my own State upon that subject, if it is of any value to Senators. Does any Senator desire it?

Mr. SPOONER. As I understand the Senator, that question would not arise as to an exported article unless prohibited by the laws of the country to which it was consigned.

Mr. McCUMBER. Certainly.

Mr. SPOONER. Or unless they had no law on the subject.

Mr. McCUMBER. No law covering it.

Mr. SPOONER. Unless they had no law covering this matter.

Mr. McCUMBER. Yes; that was my understanding.

Mr. SPOONER. Does the Senator know whether food stuffs packed in borax imported to this country are permitted under existing law or under this bill?

Mr. McCUMBER. I do not know of any foods of that character that are packed in borax.

Mr. SPOONER. Well, take hams that are imported here.

Mr. McCUMBER. I do not know of any imported hams.

Mr. KEAN. Westphalia hams are imported.

Mr. McCUMBER. I do not know how the packing is done. We have already laws upon our statute book which allow the Secretary of Agriculture to examine into the imports, and if it is found that the products are naturally deleterious or that they are improperly branded, they may be refused admission. Under that law a great many articles are refused admission, but I do not understand that anyone has decided that the mere packing in borax of itself renders the article injurious or deleterious. There is no question, of course, but what it might be so saturated and impregnated with borax that it would fall under the ban of the prohibitive laws of States on this subject.

Mr. SPOONER. I think there must be some interest in that subject or this bill would not be so carefully drawn, in the interest of the packers, in order to permit packing in borax.

Mr. McCUMBER. I have explained to the Senate that the orders from Great Britain (and these meats are sold upon orders—they are not shipped there and then afterwards sold—as a rule, they are sold on orders) require that certain meats shall be wrapped or preserved by borax in transit; and it is to meet the demand of the foreign consumer or the one who orders it. I have here a number of orders from Liverpool, for instance, as sample orders. They are the real orders from Liverpool, and in every instance the order is for so many barrels or pounds of ham packed in borax. Now, if there is nothing in the laws of Great Britain against such packing, and if the order requests that it be so packed, certainly there would be no objection to making it clear that the law would not interfere with such coverings or such packings as the foreign trade might demand.

Mr. SPOONER. Where is that provision in the bill?

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, if I may add to the suggestions of the Senator from North Dakota, I will state that the provisions of the bill are sufficiently drastic and specific to prohibit the transportation from State to State of this class of articles that come within the exception as to the export trade. Then we were met with the proposition that we should not attempt to enforce upon other countries the same morals in this business that we thought sufficient for our own, provided that they themselves did not think these restrictions were necessary. So, having prohibited interstate commerce in this class of articles among our own States, for which we are responsible, we made the exception that if a foreign country entertained different views in regard to the desirability of this class of packing we would not run counter to them and shut out the export trade from doing business with them simply because they ought not to be compelled to comply with restrictions necessarily adopted for our own country. That was the reason for this exceptional provision.

The Senator will find in the body of the bill that the class of articles that are within the exception as applied to the export trade are absolutely prohibited as between our own States. We are protecting our own people, and then we are protecting the people of other countries from imposition at the hands of our own people only to the limit that they demand such protection. But we are applying the same rule to the people governed under the laws of other countries that we apply to people governed under our own laws. That is the reason for the exception.

Mr. SPOONER. That is a very altruistic position, intended, I should think, not much to build up the commerce of the United States, especially if the subdivision in which this proviso occurs should be published extensively in other countries. The context, together with the proviso, would carry to the average mind abroad even a rather sinister import. I do not know—I am quite ignorant on the subject, as I am on a great many others—what countries abroad have such laws and the terms of such laws; but this subdivision, which I have just glanced at for the first time, I will read. It is brief.

Fourth. If it—

That is, the article—

contain any added poisonous—

"Poisonous." That is a large word—poisonous or other ingredients which may render such article injurious to human health.

That is about as concentrated and concise a sentence as could very well be devised. This is the qualification:

Provided, That goods containing this added poison——

Mr. TELLER. What section is the Senator reading?

Mr. SPOONER. I am reading at the top of page 8, subdivision 4. To put the proviso in briefer language would make the subdivision read this way:

If it contain any added poisonous or other ingredients which may render such article injurious to human health: Provided, That added poisonous or other ingredients which may rended such articles injurious to human health may be exported.

Mr. McCUMBER. Then the objection of the Senator, I understand, is not so much to the construction as to the place in which it appears in the bill.

Mr. SPOONER. Oh, no; it is not the place. The place does not alter the language.

Mr. McCUMBER. It renders its connection possible with reference to the first location the Senator has read.

Mr. SPOONER. The location of the proviso does not make it any less a modification or qualification of the context. I take it it will be worse if you apply it to the whole of section 9, which precedes it. There are other subdivisions of section 9, are there not?

Mr. HEYBURN. It relates to the clause commencing at line 17, page 7?

Mr. SPOONER. But it will be a qualification of the whole, I think.

Mr. HEYBURN. The qualification does not relate back of line 17 on page 7. This is the beginning of a new subject-matter.

Mr. SPOONER. I am glad it does not. If it related clear back it would be abominable, and relating back only to line 17 it is tolerably abominable, if there is any such thing as degree in that.

Now, it would read this way: That these things, although not permitted in the interest of human health—women, children, and men—to be dealt in, to be transported from State to State, to be knowingly sold by anybody to anybody in any of the States or Territories of the United States, may be shipped abroad, provided some scoundrel over there asks that they be shipped to him and there is no law there to punish him for secretly selling to people what we will not permit our people to use in this country. That is put in for the benefit of the packers primarily, but it would not be limited in its application to the packers. It applies to every manufacture and to all drugs, to all foods, to every eatable and potable thing, does it not, for which there might be a demand in other countries?

Now, I want to say a word to my friend who has this bill in charge. He spoke about pushing it to a vote this afternoon. The bill has not been long at this session before the Senate. It is a bill which I presume few Senators have had time to study. I have had no time to study it for one. It is a bill the purpose of which is good, and I think it is an improvement undoubtedly on the bill considered at the last session. But it is a measure which every Senator ought to have an opportunity to read carefully. I suggest to the Senator that as no one wants to delay the bill beyond a reasonable time for debate, he ask the Senate to fix a time for a vote on the bill and amendments, say a week hence, or something of that sort. Every Senator will have notice then that he must study the bill and be ready with his amendments or the discussion, for at a certain time it will be voted upon.

Mr. HEYBURN. It was my intention before having the bill laid aside to-day to do just what the Senator has suggested, to ask that a time be fixed.

Mr. SPOONER. I had no idea I could suggest a thing to the Senator he had not already thought of.

Mr. HEYBURN. But, Mr. President, we have had this bill on the Calendar since the beginning of the present session of Congress, and, of course, due notice that the bill at the proper time would be called up for consideration.

Mr. SPOONER. Oh, of course.

Mr. HEYBURN. The consideration seems to be rather in the nature of criticism of the bill. In legislation criticism should naturally be followed by proposed amendments. If that provision should be out of the bill it should be attacked through the means of an amendment or a motion to strike it out. Objection to the bill in general terms does not result in making any progress in the consideration of a bill.

I should like to make a suggestion in response to the criticism of the Senator from Wisconsin as to that provision of the bill. In legislating we naturally take into consideration the conditions under which we legislate. The committee spent weeks and months in the consideration of this measure at this and other sessions of Congress, and we have inquired into the conditions to which this legislation was directed. That provision was not incorporated into the bill until it became apparent that there was a certain class of our export trade that did business, with the consent of the laws of the countries under which those live with whom they did business, with people who do not entertain the same views as are entertained in this country in regard to what may be necessary to preserve human health.

In other words, we ship from this country vast quantities of horse meat to be used in certain foreign countries. We do not use it at home at all. A dealer in the State of Oregon told me, having been in the business, as he said, five years, that not one single pound of that commodity had been used or consumed in this country, but that he found a market for it in the countries of Europe.

Now, if those people want that kind of a commodity, if they are presumed to be intelligent enough to determine what they want and what is conducive to their health or destructive of it, and are convinced that they have no objection to that class of commerce or commodity, there is no reason why we should constitute ourselves the guardian of their health. It is not for us to say—except it would not be permitted to go beyond a certain line, and neither do we in this bill—that those people shall not, in the exercise of their judgment, consume a certain class of articles.

Mr. SPOONER. Is this horse beef sold as horse meat?

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes; it has a picture of a horse on the can.

Mr. KEAN. It is canned?

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes.

Mr. KEAN. In Idaho?

Mr. HEYBURN. No. It was during a certain period when horses were worth nothing, but I do not care to be diverted into a discussion of that period or that condition.

Mr. SPOONER. Why not put on the can, under subdivision 4, the name of the poisonous or other ingredients injurious to human health?

Mr. HEYBURN. As to the use of the term "poisonous," let me state that everything which contains poison is not poison. It depends on the quantity and the combination. A very large majority of the things consumed by the human family contain, under analysis, some kind of poison, but it depends upon the combination, the chemical relation which it bears to the body in which it exists as to whether or not it is dangerous to take into the human system.

Mr. SPOONER. But this bill provides for a detrimental and diabolical combination:

> If it contain any added poisonous or other ingredients which may render such article injurious to human health.

Mr. HEYBURN. The word "added" is a word of limitation there. The word "added" simply means that nothing shall be added to the poisons already existing in the substance. Take any substance. Poisons may be extracted from fruit, from the kernel of the peach, from acids contained in fruits. The word "added" is a word of limitation. In other words, after providing carefully against poisons, recognizing the fact that poisons exist independent of any human action in certain commodities, we have provided that no added poisonous or other ingredient which may render such article injurious to human health shall be deemed to be adulterated. That is under the definitions of adulterated articles.

Mr. SPOONER. "Added" poison. That implies that it is an additional poison.

Mr. HEYBURN. Let me make a suggestion to the Senator.

Mr. SPOONER. If the Senator will be permit me, he misapprehends me. I am not troubled about the word "added." I am troubled about the conclusion here that it is an article thus constituted injurious to human health. The Senator would not give or sell to me, knowingly, an article injurious to human health.

Mr. HEYBURN. It is forbidden by the terms of this bill.

Mr. SPOONER. Would he give it to a Frenchman?

Mr. HEYBURN. No; and this does not permit that it shall be given to a Frenchman.

Mr. SPOONER. Yes; it permits that it may be sent anywhere in the world if some rascally merchant asks that it be sent to him and there happens to be no law to prohibit it.

Mr. HEYBURN. But the committee inquired as to the existence of laws in foreign countries, and there are other words of limitation in this clause that I think the Senator has overlooked.

Mr. SPOONER. Very likely. I have not carefully read the section.

Mr. HEYBURN. For instance, this is the limitation:

> Provided no substance is used that is in conflict with the laws of the country to which the goods are to be shipped.

The fact is that foreign countries with which we do business have more stringent laws than we have, and I am sorry to say that in some instances they are engaged in the special manufacturing of articles of commerce for the American market that they are not allowed to sell in the country where the articles are made, and we here have undertaken to be more generous in our treatment of them. If their laws forbid it, we do not allow our people to violate their laws in the interest of commerce.

Mr. SPOONER. What I should like to inquire is this: If the Senator is correct in saying that their laws are more stringent than ours in this respect, what is the object of this proviso? What do the packers want it for?

Mr. HEYBURN. The packers who do business with countries having these laws are in exactly the same position as the man who manufactures a bogus article in one of our States for the purpose of finding a surreptitious market for it in another State. That is the position they are in, and we put them in that position. This bill does not undertake to prevent the manufacture of these articles, but it undertakes to prevent the circulation of them, and we urge as one of the strongest reasons for the enactment of this legislation the protection of the State into which it shall be sent. We are recognizing the same principle in dealing with these foreign countries, because we realize that in the case of these goods, either in violation of their law or in violation of this law, once they are out of the jurisdiction where they are made and landed in unbroken packages in a foreign jurisdiction, whether it be in a State or beyond the waters, it is a dangerous thing to have them in a community, and makes trouble for foreign countries just as it makes trouble for States here. One of the highest functions performed by the legislation proposed by this bill is that it protects the States against imposition from other States and that it protects the foreign market, which is constantly a critic of our country and our commerce, by preventing our people from interjecting such an article into the foreign market under conditions where it might become a contraband article and might not, according to whether it was discovered. It places our people and foreign people upon the same status in that regard.

Mr. McCUMBER. Let me call the attention of the Senator from Wisconsin to another proposition. This section is directed not to the character of the articles that shall be shipped to another country, but as to the preparation for the shipment of the articles. "When prepared and packed." What we mean by the word "prepared" is not how it may be manufactured, but the preparation and the wrapping which may be used for the purpose of protecting it in its course across the ocean.

Mr. SPOONER. Mr. President, I have a few words to add.

Mr. HEYBURN. If the Senator will permit me, I call his attention to section 2, page 2, which covers the general question of the exportation of deleterious or misbranded articles.

Mr. SPOONER. Well, this is specific.

Mr. HEYBURN. Absolutely.

Mr. SPOONER. This qualifies that, does it not?

Mr. HEYBURN. I think the Senator will find it does not qualify it. As suggested by the Senator from North Dakota, it simply deals with the conditions of shipping—the wrapping and the packing.

Mr. SPOONER. The Senator from Idaho and the Senator from North Dakota must, I think, conclude upon a rereading of this language that they have no justification for that contention:

Fourth. If it contain any added poisonous or other ingredient which may render such article injurious to human health: Provided, That goods intended for export shall not be deemed misbranded or adulterated when prepared and packed——

Mr. HEYBURN. "Prepared" relates to packed.

Mr. SPOONER. "Prepared" does not relate to packed, in my opinion.

Mr. McCUMBER. That is a difference of construction.

Mr. HEYBURN. Can the Senator suggest some word there that will make it more plainly certain that it does not relate to packed?

Mr. SPOONER. The Senators have been explaining to me for some time that it meant packing in borax.

Mr. HEYBURN. It has no connection with borax, but any injurious packing.

Mr. SPOONER. Hams are packed in borax. But this proposed statute is not confined to packing. The provision speaks of goods which shall not be deemed misbranded or adulterated when prepared and packed.

Mr. McCUMBER. Does the Senator understand, for instance, how hams are prepared by the use of borax before they are shipped to a foreign country? It is not merely the wrapping around the ham; it is rubbed into it to some extent. It is claimed that by the use of water the amount of boracic acid that would be absorbed by the ham can be taken out entirely. That is the claim. I do not know whether it can be done or not, but at least the merchants who order hams to be shipped across the ocean feel that it is the better way and the safer way to so prepare them. It is not packing alone. The wrappings possibly that are around the hams are saturated with borax; but they are prepared by a thin coating around the ham itself; and that is what the word "prepared" is intended to cover.

Mr. SPOONER. What would the word "prepared" mean as applied to a bottle containing some drug or to a box of some drug?

Mr. McCUMBER. It certainly would not mean something in the manufacture of the drug.

Mr. SPOONER. It would not?

Mr. McCUMBER. And no court, I maintain, would hold that when the words "prepared and packed for shipment" were used the word "prepared" could be construed to mean the ingredients entering into the drug itself.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. SPOONER. I am not quite through.

Mr. LODGE. I was going to ask the Senator to yield to me for a moment.

Mr. SPOONER. I want to put a question to the Senator from North Dakota, and then I will be through. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield?

Mr. HEYBURN. Go ahead. I have the floor, but I will yield.

Mr. SPOONER. I beg pardon. Does the Senator from North Dakota contend that a box of candy or a barrel of candy containing poisonous ingredients, prohibited from transport from State to State and sale in this country, would not be permitted under this proviso to be exported?

Mr. McCUMBER. That would be my construction.

Mr. SPOONER. Provided they have no law excluding this specific thing?

Mr. McCUMBER. I thought I made my construction clear.

Mr. SPOONER. I am testing the Senator's construction.

Mr. McCUMBER. Let me call the Senator's attention to the language:

Provided, That goods intended for export shall not be deemed misbranded or adulterated when prepared and packed in accordance with specifications of the foreign purchaser.

Mr. SPOONER. Now, Mr. President——

Mr. McCUMBER. I was answering the Senator.

Mr. SPOONER. I beg the Senator's pardon.

Mr. McCUMBER. I say the word "prepared," used in the context of the whole sentence and the object which is clearly apparent in the sentence itself, simply means the packing and the preparation for shipment, and it does not mean that candies or any other article which is manufactured and by their manufacture contain poisonous ingredients, could be shipped under that provision. I do not think that any court would so hold.

Mr. SPOONER. I do not think any court would fail to so hold.

Mr. McCUMBER. I will say candidly that there is really a difference of opinion upon the construction.

Mr. SPOONER. That I know. I submit to my good friend that the language ought to be so plain that there should be no difference of opinion about it.

Provided, That goods intended for export shall not be deemed misbranded or adulterated—

Let us stop there. What does that mean? Packing?—

shall not be deemed misbranded or adulterated when prepared and packed in accordance with specifications of the foreign purchaser: Provided, etc.

Mr. McCUMBER. The word "prepared," as I have stated, covers the method of protecting the article. It may be packing; it may be a preparation to make ready for packing.

Mr. SPOONER. What does the word "adulterated" mean, then?

Mr. McCUMBER. We certainly understand the word "adulterated." It shall not be deemed to be adulterated, as applied in this particular case, by the mere preparation of something over it which is in accordance with the laws and not against the laws of the State or country to which it is consigned.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I wish to call the attention of the Senator from Wisconsin to an amendment which I have offered to that section as an additional provision, which I think would cover it as a substitute:

That when in the prepartion of food products for shipment they are preserved by an external application applied in such manner that the preservative is necessarily removed mechanically or by maceration in water or otherwise, the provisions of this act shall be construed as applying only when said products are ready for consumption.

Mr. SPOONER. What particular Massachusetts product does the Senator have in mind?

Mr. LODGE. I have no particular Massachusetts product in mind any more than I suppose the Senator from Wisconsin has Wisconsin products in mind in opposing the bill.

Mr. SPOONER. I am shooting at the flock.

Mr. LODGE. It is needless to say I have in mind fish; but it applies to a great many other articles. Salt fish are widely distributed not only in this country, but there is a very large West Indian trade.

Mr. SPOONER. I must say that the amendment proposed by the Senator from Massachusetts seems to be admirably adapted to the object which he has in view, and is not susceptible to the objection which I have been making to the other provision. Is it satisfactory to the Senator who has charge of the bill in place of the proviso?

Mr. HEYBURN. I think the Senator has overlooked the fact that by the provisions that are under criticism under the head of "definitions" the proviso does not relate to the process of preparing goods for the market or to the sale or the disposition of them. It is a limitation under the head of "definitions" which begins at line 22, page 5. There the bill undertakes to give the definitions of the various subjects of the provisions of the bill. The Senator has read at the top of page 8, under the head of "Fourth. If it contain any added poisonous or other ingredient which may render such article injurious to human health." That is simply one of the definitions, and there are many definitions, covering three pages.

Mr. SPOONER. Will the Senator allow me to read another definition?

Mr. HEYBURN. Certainly.

Mr. SPOONER. I turn to page 7. Am I interfering with the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. LODGE. No; I was simply going to move that amendment. If there is no amendment pending, I wanted to move the amendment.

Mr. SPOONER (reading):

In the case of confectionery an article shall be deemed to be adulterated if it contain terra alba, barytes, talc, chrome yellow, or other mineral substances or poisonous colors or flavors, or other ingredients deleterious or detrimental to health.

Now, carrying that language over to this proviso, does the Senator say that the word "adulterated" in the second line of the proviso does not take out candy for export, which on the other page is prohibited for use in this country?

Mr. HEYBURN. I think the proviso applies only to the method of packing, using the term "packing" as applied to preparing and protecting for shipment.

Mr. SPOONER. It says "goods intended for export shall not be deemed misbranded or adulterated * * * provided," etc.

Mr. HEYBURN. Under the general provisions of the bill goods are adulterated by being wrapped or packed in poisonous substances, by having them applied to it in the nature of an embalming process, or applied to the outside in many different ways.

Mr. SPOONER. Why not make that plain?

Mr. HEYBURN. I would be very glad if the Senator would suggest an amendment. Perhaps we could take out the word "provided" and let that stand as an independent proposition.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I think the amendment I now move for addition to line 9 is a little more carefully framed than the one in regard to goods of foreign export. It certainly does not go so far. It confines the exemption simply to external applications.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Massachusetts will be read.

The SECRETARY. On page 8, line 9, after the word "preparation," insert the following additional proviso:

Provided further, That when in the preparation of food products for shipment they are preserved by an external application applied in such manner that the preservative is necessarily removed mechanically or by maceration in water or otherwise, the provisions of this act shall be construed as applying only when said products are ready for consumption.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, that affords a perfectly ready test on any article of that sort. The officers charged with this duty will have nothing to do but to take a specimen of that kind and treat it as it would be treated if prepared for consumption. If after that treatment they still find that it contains poisonous substances, it becomes obnoxious to all the clauses of the bill. But if it is found not to contain such substances after its preparation for consumption, then, no matter what the external application was, it is held to be wholesome and unadulterated.

There are certain products which have to be protected by applications or by wrappings, which inevitably contain matters which in themselves are deleterious to human health, but which are entirely disposed of the moment the article is prepared for consumption. This amendment does not remove the control over those articles or exempt them. It simply provides that they shall be tested in a certain way—that is, after the external application has been removed—in order to give a fair test. It seems to me that it is not an unreasonable proposition.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I think the Senator will find a certain defect in this amendment, which undoubtedly may be covered by a further amendment. I will take an example, so that it will be made clear to him. Let us take this question of the packing of hams, ribs, etc., in borax. That is a common method of packing them for shipment for interstate commerce. The amendment which the Senator proposes provides that if the things that are used for an application to preserve them, though they may be poisonous and injurious in themselves, can be separated by washing—by maceration in water—then those goods may be shipped.

Now, let us take the simple illustration we have had of the shipping of hams. You therefore provide by law that no matter how poisonous the ingredient, or whatever you may call it, is used for an application it shall be allowed free transportation from one State to another. It is under that guard, that protection, until it is sold in original packages, we will say, and enters into the property of a State. After it enters into the general property of the State we have no further control over it, There is nothing that compels the consignee of the goods to use this macerating process, but he sells it out as he does to-day. Now, let me give the Senator an example of that.

Mr. LODGE. If the Senator will pardon me for interrupting him, I think he misapprehends the precise point of the amendment, which is that the act shall be construed as applying only when said products are ready for consumption. That is when the man authorizes these articles and tests them at the manufactory, where, I suppose, all the tests are to be made, they are not to be tested until these external applications are removed. Then if they show poisonous ingredients they are, of course, prohibited. If they do not show them, then it is demonstrated that the poisonous substance is confined to the wrapper or some external application.

Mr. McCUMBER. But, Mr. President, who will test them?

Mr. LODGE. How are you going to test anything?

Mr. McCUMBER. We must test them before they reach the foreign country to which they are consigned.

Mr. LODGE. That is precisely what I mean the test shall be. This is only defining the nature of the test.

Mr. HEYBURN. I suggest that they are not within our jurisdiction. That is the trouble. When they are ready for use they have passed beyond our jurisdiction.

Mr. LODGE. I am quite aware of that. This is only defining the method of the test. The test is to be made at the time and place that the bill provides for. This only says when that test is made the articles shall be tested not as they are prepared for shipment, but as they are prepared for consumption.

Mr. HEYBURN. As they will be when ready for the consumer?

Mr. LODGE. As they will be when ready for the consumer.

Mr. HEYBURN. Then they will have passed out of our jurisdiction.

Mr. LODGE. No; what will prevent the testing officer from testing the article when ready for consumption?

Mr. HEYBURN. Because it will be necessary, when it reaches the store, for the retailer to remove.

Mr. LODGE. Does the Senator mean that the testing officers are to test every can that goes out?

Mr. HEYBURN. No; but the Senator is taking a case where the articles are deleterious to health by reason of the process of preparation. When they pass out of the unbroken package into the general channel of business we have lost jurisdiction of them—this bill has lost jurisdiction of them.

Mr. LODGE. I quite see that.

Mr. HEYBURN. And a provision as to what conditions would then exist is not a protection.

Mr. LODGE. No; but at what point is the test made?

Mr. HEYBURN. Well, if the test is made at the manufactory you simply determine what condition would exist if certain things were done; but you do not protect the person into whose hands the commodity finally passes.

Mr. LODGE. But I am taking some article now that does not involve a question of external application. How are you going to test any article, and where?

Mr. HEYBURN. This bill provides that you may test the article on the shelf of the retailer.

Mr. LODGE. Very well. This does not interfere with that in the least.

Mr. HEYBURN. Then it is in the hands of the householder.

Mr. LODGE. Not at all. It is quite possible to remove the external application and put it in water and test it and put it back.

Mr. HEYBURN. Then it is to be done by the consumer?

Mr. LODGE. Not necessarily.

Mr. HEYBURN. Some one goes to a store and buys a ham nicely wrapped and prepared and takes it home The merchant himself does not remove this deleterious condition at all, but it does depend on the consumer as to whether he will remove it. Suppose he is not learned enough in what is necessary to preserve his health to do it and it is not removed and his health suffers, where is the protection this bill would afford him?

Mr. LODGE. That opens up a very extensive question. As I understand it, the Senator expects that every individual ham on the shelves of a retailer is to be examined by a Government officer.

Mr. HEYBURN. No.

Mr. LODGE. Then if it is not, he is going to test some hams.

Mr. HEYBURN. The wisdom of this bill becomes apparent. We prevent men from doing that which can ultimately result in injury to the uninformed. That is provided by the bill.

Mr. LODGE. No; but what I want to get at is where the test is applied. The Senator says it is to be done on the shelves of the retailer. I take it at any point.

Mr. HEYBURN. At the factory.

Mr. LODGE. Well, at the factory. Does the Senator propose to have every ham that goes out of the factory tested before it goes out?

Mr. HEYBURN. No; but we propose to place a responsibility upon the manufacturer, under which he will not dare to violate the provisions of this law or of the State law.

Mr. LODGE. Very well; that is all I want; and I do not see how my amendment interferes with that the least in the world.

Mr. HEYBURN. As I understand it, if the Senator will pardon me, it would allow the manufacturer to surround the commodity with conditions that would depend as to whether they were injurious or not upon the intelligence of the consumer.

Mr. LODGE. But you propose to allow him to do that to the foreigner, and a great deal more than that.

Mr. HEYBURN. No; we simply say that goods for foreign trade shall conform to foreign laws.

Mr. McCUMBER. Let me give an example.

Mr. LODGE. I am still unable to see why it is not fair. Take candy, for example. There may be any number of poisons in the box or whatever the candy is wrapped in. There may be any number of deleterious substances in it. That is the wrapper. That is the external application in that candy. Now, is that to be shut out of the market on account of that? How is he to test it? Of course he tests the candy as it is consumed, not as it is not consumed.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, the principle of the bill is to prevent the manufacture of the forbidden things and the placing of them on the market. At the last session of Congress one of the objections that appeared to me most reasonable to the bill proposed then was that it went to the consumer or the retail dealer rather than the manufacturer. In this bill we have undertaken to see, so far as the legislation could do it, that there is no manufacturer to put upon the market and send out these things. That is what we have undertaken. If we relax to the extent of the suggestion in the Senator's amendment by allowing the manufacturer to do something admittedly wrong in the hope that the wrong may be cured at some period between the mill and the mouth, then you have defeated the purpose of the measure.

Mr. LODGE. I deny absolutely that it is admittedly wrong. There is an immense number of articles—the Senator has mentioned them, hams and things of that sort—that require external applications which in themselves are deleterious. This amendment of mine is borrowed from the House bill that came to us and is in the exact language of the bill which passed the other House. It is only here that it has been discovered that it was going to lead to such abuses; it is only here that objection is made to that carefully guarded amendment of mine, which simply prescribes the method of the test and defines it, providing that nothing in the article itself shall be poisonous. That is objected to in a bill which contains a clause which, in so many words, permits us to sell adulterated goods to foreigners.

Mr. President, it seems to me that is hardly fair. I am not proposing in this amendment any strange or new thing. The other House adopted it. I merely copied it from their bill. It is only here that it has been eliminated.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I think we may take a little illustration, and we shall then be pretty well enabled to understand the real effect of the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE]. Now, bearing in mind that the object of the bill is to prevent the manufacturer or anyone else sending goods into interstate commerce which, when they arrive in the store of the retailer or in the home, are poisonous or injurious—if that is a good object of the bill, the next question, then, is whether the amendment of the Senator is diametrically opposed to that object.

Let us follow it out in its application. I will take the Chicago packing houses. They make an external application of borax upon their hams. They use great quantities of it. That borax permeates the meat to a certain extent. Now, we will admit that it is removed by maceration in water or that otherwise you may eliminate entirely all of the boracic acid that is absorbed by these meats in the process—we will admit that to be true. That entitles it to shipment. Then it goes to my State or to any other State in the Union. It goes into the hands of the dealer in meats or the grocer. There is no law on earth to compel the grocer or the dealer in meats to use that macerating process to remove the boracic acid. The chances are nine out of ten that he will not touch it, that it will go out to the consumer just exactly in the condition it was when it left the packing house in Chicago. Therefore the object of the bill, so far as that particular kind of food is concerned, would be entirely destroyed. That must necessarily be the effect of the amendment.

Mr. LODGE. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. McCUMBER. Certainly.

Mr. LODGE. Then, do I understand that the consumer eats the ham without cooking it?

Mr. McCUMBER. I did not say that.

Mr. LODGE. I ask the Senator, does not the consumer soak the ham and cook it before he eats it, or does he eat it just as it comes from the grocer? I supposed hams were almost always soaked and cooked before being eaten; but that may be the result of my ignorance.

Mr. McCUMBER. The consumer does not know anything about the ham containing borax.

Mr. LODGE. Hams, as I understand, are always soaked and cooked before being eaten.

Mr. HEYBURN. Ninety per cent of the consumers take the hams as they come from the grocer and cook them.

Mr. LODGE. I understand the Senator from Idaho [Mr. HEYBURN] to say that 90 per cent of the consumers eat them as they come in the covering from the grocer.

Mr. McCUMBER. The Senator has a very vivid imagination to get that understanding.

Mr. LODGE. I did not say the Senator from North Dakota said so; but I understood the Senator from Idaho had said so. I think he made the remark about 90 per cent doing that.

Mr. McCUMBER. He said 90 per cent, but I did not understand the Senator from Idaho to make the remark that they were not cooked. I do not understand that the mere process of cooking will materially affect the boracic acid that is contained in the meat.

Now, let me give the Senator an example. I have before me the report of the food commissioner of my own State. He examined very thoroughly the hams that came from the great packing houses of Chicago and Omaha. The result of his investigation proved it to be a fact that every pound that was inspected by him contained from 10—never less than 10—up to 20 grains of boracic acid. When given for medicinal purposes, from 5 to 10 grains is the dose that is given in a day. So that if one would consume 1 pound of these hams packed in borax, and thoroughly impregnated with boracic acid, he would consume about four times the average dose that would be given in any case where that acid is given for medicinal purposes. I simply suggest this as a reason why there should be at least some modification of the Senator's amendment.

I will say to the Senator here that I agree with him perfectly that if borax is absolutely necessary and is the only preservative, and it can be eliminated by the use of a little washing with water, possibly it is best that it should be used; but, from such information as I can obtain, it is not necessary, except to preserve those meats which are already tainted or injured to a certain extent. I mean for inland commerce. In crossing the ocean it is impossible to keep such meats from absorbing a great deal of moisture, and it has been stated—I think it was stated before our committee—that it is almost essential, so far as the foreign trade is concerned, to pack them in borax. As I understand—I will not be certain—where they are so packed, under the laws of Great Britain, this must be removed before they go into the market generally. If that is true there is absolutely good protection to the consignee of such goods so packed. But there is absolutely no protection under this amendment for the consumer of goods which have been adulterated, or at least so packed that they become injurious to health.

I shall be glad to have an amendment made in some way so that it will be reasonable, but I really think it would be unreasonable as the Senator has framed it.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I do not want to break the bill down by any amendment. That is not my purpose. I do not think, however, that we want to make a bill to be used as a means of oppression and which could be used as against honest traders and honest manufacturers, as this undoubtedly could be as it now stands.

I had supposed—and I thought the amendment covered that point—that submersion in water was a necessary part of cooking or preparing hams for the table. I have been so informed on what I thought was good authority, but I am told now that it is not.

Mr. McCUMBER. The Senator would not claim that he had that authority about smoked hams?

Mr. LODGE. I have seen smoked hams treated in that way. I have known of their being soaked for forty-eight hours and greatly improved by that process; but, at all events, in the first place the external covering, which I assume has to be taken off, undoubtedly will contain deleterious substances. If we can not assume that the external covering, being cotton or muslin or whatever it may be that is put around the ham, is going to be taken off by the consumer, then we ought not to permit it to be put on. The consumers take that off now, and I thought it was fair to assume that they always prepared the food for consumption in the ordinary way; and the ordinary way, I am still inclined to think, is by cooking and by cooking in water or after submersion in water. I had supposed that this simply applied in this way: That when you send an officer into a factory he goes into the factory and tests the ham as it lies there in its covering for shipment. Of course, in that case it contains deleterious substances; but that is not the shape in which the people eat it. The test should be applied to the ham in the condition in which it is just before being cooked. If the ham is found to be safe when tested in the form in which people eat it, then it seems to me it is fair to allow it to be shipped in that form.

I do not want to oppose the bill, but, on the contrary, I am heartily in favor of it. I do not, however, think it is desirable to make it oppressive and to make it so that it will interfere with reasonable trade or prevent men from trading who have only an honest purpose in view.

In the matter of fish, about which the Senator from Wisconsin asked me, I will say that fish are preserved by salting, to begin with. As I understand, the packing that is put around the packages when the fish are prepared in what is known as the "shredded form" is simply to keep them in the package. To interfere with that would interfere enormously with trade in every direction, both foreign and domestic.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I do not think the Senator will find anything in the bill that will in the slightest degree tend to do an injustice; on the contrary, I can not conceive of a law being drawn with greater care and throwing greater safeguards around the defendant in any criminal prosecution than is found in this bill.

We have no provision for an inspector, and my opinion is that these cases will be determined by the court when they come up. They must be determined by the court. There is no law requiring, and there is nothing in this bill requiring, that a shipper shall not use borax, and all of it that he desires; but if it were found that the use of borax as a packing for meat was absolutely deleterious as it is usually used by people, then in a case before the courts that question would come up and it would be determined, and determined, of course, in that case only, but that would be a precedent for other cases.

I can not see that any person has a valid right to use any such packing on any meat as would be injurious to the public, and if depriving him of the right to so pack meats is injurious to him it is depriving him only of an opportunity to do a wrong to the public.

The Senator has spoken several times about the method of preparing hams. I do not myself pretend to be a cook, and I do not know what information of a specialized character the Senator from Massachusetts may have upon the subject, but I do know that if you take the ordinary smoked ham, or the sugar-cured ham, or whatever you may call it, as it comes from the manufacturer it is boiled without being first soaked; certainly is not first soaked in water, whether it is fried or otherwise. There may be cases in which it may be soaked to take out the extra amount of saltpeter or salt that is in it, but not as it is used in the ordinary household. There is no occasion for it, unless they think that there is something in it that is improper. I say that the public has not got that knowledge generally.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE].

Mr. HALE. It is getting a little late, and there is a desire that we have an executive session.

Mr. HEYBURN. Will the Senator yield to me for a moment?

Mr. HALE. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, I ask at this time that a date be fixed for taking a vote on this bill. I ask that on Monday, January 22, the bill and the amendments may be considered and disposed of.

Mr. McCUMBER. I would suggest to the Senator that he give a longer time than that. I want to see every amendment Senators may have to offer properly considered, and I want them to have plenty of time to read the bill. I hope the Senator will not ask that a time prior to February, and, possibly, prior to the middle of February, be fixed. I think we can get a vote on the bill by that time.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, I would suggest to the Senator that we are just beginning the consideration of the bill. Important amendments have been offered that have not yet been considered, and I suggest to the Senator that he does not try to-day to fix a time for a vote on the bill. The Senator knows that he will have no difficulty in getting some reasonable time fixed, but there are other matters that are important, and I hope the Senator will not at this time attempt to secure an agreement for a final vote.

Mr. HEYBURN. My suggestion as to a date for a vote was tentative only. I am not inclined to ask that the time for the consideration of the bill shall be shortened beyond reason. The 1st of February would be a reasonable time, but, inasmuch as the attendance at this particular time is somewhat meager, if the Senate is not ready to consider the matter now, I will give notice that to-morrow at the conclusion of the morning business I shall ask the Senate to fix a time to take the final vote on this bill. I will leave it in that way.

CONTINGENT FUND OF THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

Mr. HALE. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. ALLISON. I ask the Senator to withhold his motion for a moment.

Mr. HALE. I yield to the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. ALLISON. I am directed by the Committee on Appropriations, to whom was referred the joint resolution (H. J. R. 68) relating to contingent expenses of the House of Representatives, to report it without amendment. I ask unanimous consent for its present consideration.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Iowa asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of the joint resolution just reported by him. The joint resolution will be read for the information of the Senate.

The Secretary read the joint resolution, as follows:

Resolved, etc., That the appropriation made for the miscellaneous items of the contingent expenses of the House of Representatives for the fiscal year 1906 is hereby made available for the payment of salaries and labor heretofore or hereafter specifically ordered by the House of Representatives of the present Congress, in addition to the purposes for which said appropriation is otherwise available.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution.

Mr. TELLER. I wish the chairman of the committee would explain the necessity for this joint resolution. I do not myself understand why it is necessary to pass it, and I should like to be informed.

Mr. ALLISON. I only know, Mr. President, that the House of Representatives sent this joint resolution to us with a statement that their contingent fund available for the purposes set forth in the joint resolution has been practically exhausted, and they desire that the joint resolution may be passed in this form, in order that they may be able to pay for labor and other services. It is the custom, I believe, for the Senate to arrange its contingent fund in its own way, and I think courtesy requires that we should allow the House of Representatives to do the same thing.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President, I have not the slightest intention of interfering with that custom. I understand it. I simply wanted to know what had happened in another place to make it necessary to enact this kind of legislation now.

Mr. ALLISON. The only thing that has happened is the fact that there is a deficiency in the appropriation for miscellaneous expenses.

Mr. TELLER. In their expenses they have exceeded their income.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. HALE. I renew my motion that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After eight minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at 4 o'clock and 10 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Wednesday, January 17, 1906, at 12 o'clock meridian.

NOMINATIONS.

QUESTION OF PRIVILEGE.

Mr. STEENERSON. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of privilege.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. STEENERSON. My attention has been called to articles appearing in the newspapers, particularly one in the Boston Globe, and another one in the Boston Herald, of last Sunday. The first-mentioned article I mark and send to the Clerk's desk to have it read.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman sends to the Clerk's desk an article and desires that it be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

It was at the White House to-day that the most exciting scenes took place in the fight to put down the insurrection. The President sent for Representative STEENERSON, of Minnesota. Mr. STEENERSON is a beet-sugar man opposed to the Philippine tariff bill, and is with the insurgents on the antistatehood proposition.

"Mr. STEENERSON," the President said, "had I known you were going to take the position you have in regard to these two bills, I should never have given you the appointment I did, and had I power to do so would withdraw it to-day."

The appointment referred to was the appointment of one of STEENERSON'S constituents as receiver of the general land office at Crookston, Minn. When Mr. STEENERSON returned to the Capitol after his interview with the President, he announced that his position with reference to the two bills in question was unchanged.

Mr. STEENERSON. Mr. Speaker, this article does not purport to give the substance of any conversation between myself and the President, but the exact words; and if the article were true—if such a conversation actually took place—it would constitute an infringement of the privileges of the membership of this House. No lover of our country and our representative institutions could look upon any attempt to subordinate one independent coordinate branch of the Government to another otherwise than as a blow to our country's welfare, for such grave dangers lurk in the President's using the language attributed to him that it would receive and deserve the rebuke and criticism of the people. It would be a violation of the Constitution and a grave breach of the privileges of this House. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

But, Mr. Speaker, the article is false. No such language was ever used by the President in any conversation [applause on the Republican side] with me at any time, nor was anything ever said by him in my hearing that could be susceptible of any such meaning. [Renewed applause.] I denounce the article as false and untrue in every particular. [Renewed applause.] It is not only untrue, but it is ridiculous, for it states that I am a beet-sugar man and that I am opposed to the Philippine tariff bill, when I have repeatedly expressed to Members of this House that I was in favor of that bill and shall vote for it, and the President could not suppose that I was against it.

Another article, of which I will read but a short extract, appeared in the Boston Herald. The extract is as follows:

Some time ago the President nominated a friend of STEENERSON to a good Federal office. At one stage of their conversation STEENERSON was reminded of this in the following language:

"I appointed the man you recommended. I supposed you would support me and my Administration. Had I known that you were going to vote against this statehood bill I would not have made that appointment as you recommended."

That is also utterly false and untrue. No such conversation, or anything like it, ever occurred between the President and myself last Saturday or any other time. The article continues:

Mr. STEENERSON walked down Pennsylvania avenue to the Capitol, cooling his wrath and saying unpleasant things about the Republican President.

That is also false. The interview I had with the President was pleasant, and when I left the President it was in a pleasant frame of mind, and I had no wrath to cool. [Laughter and applause.] I never had an interview with the President in my life that was not pleasant, both on his part and on my part; and so far as this latter account of my interview with him on Saturday is concerned, it is as false as it can possibly be.

Similar articles have appeared in other papers, but I have not them at hand; but wherever they have appeared I wish to deny them. What the President said on this occasion was not for publication, but I authorize him at any time to publish what he may remember of the conversation. I will not undertake to do so. [Loud applause on the Republican side.]

SPECIAL IMMIGRANT INSPECTOR MARCUS BRAUN.

Mr. SULZER. Mr. Speaker, I move to discharge the Committee on Foreign Affairs from the further consideration of a privileged resolution which I send to the Clerk's desk and ask to have read and adopted.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York moves that the Committee on Foreign Affairs be discharged from the further consideration of the following resolution, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of State be, and he hereby is, respectfully requested, if not incompatible with the public interests, to send to the House of Representatives, at his earliest convenience, all letters, correspondence, dispatches, information, and documents, or copies of the same, between the Government of the United States and the Austro-Hungarian monarchy regarding, affecting, and relating to the arrest, detention, fine, and imprisonment of Special Immigrant Inspector Marcus Braun by the Hungarian Government, or its agents, in Budapest, Hungary, in the month of May, 1905.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from New York.

Mr. ADAMS of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. SULZER. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania such time as he desires.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is under the impression that the motion is not debatable except by unanimous consent.

Mr. SULZER. Mr. Speaker, there should be no objection to the resolution; it is now privileged.

Mr. ADAMS of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I simply wish to make a statement for the benefit of the House.

Mr. SULZER. Mr. Speaker, I trust the gentleman will be heard.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. ADAMS of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I would simply state for the information of the House that the State Department has no objection to the passage of this resolution, although it does not advise it, as the correspondence relates to the question of Mr. Braun being persona non grata to the Austrian Government, the correspondence having taken place between that Government and ours. The State Department, of its own volition, does not wish to publish this correspondence, as Mr. Braun is or is believed to be in the employ of another department of the Government, so that naturally the State Department, of its own volition, would not desire to give out the correspondence; but so far as the public interests are concerned, if Mr. Braun and his friends desire it, it has no objection to furnishing the correspondence.

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the gentleman from New York a question.

Mr. SULZER. Certainly.

The SPEAKER. This can only proceed by unanimous consent.

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. I ask unanimous consent to ask the gentleman the question for my information.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. Will this bring the publication of the Braun reports on the state of the immigration agencies in foreign countries?

Mr. SULZER. Let me say, Mr. Speaker, to the gentleman from Massachusetts that the resolution calling for the Braun reports on immigration passed the House last week, and I understand the Secretary of Commerce and Labor is going to send those reports to the House this week. This is a different resolution, and I want to say just a few words about it at this time.

This resolution calls for all the papers now on file in the State Department relative to the arrest, detention, and fine by the Austro-Hungarian Government of Mr. Marcus Braun, an American citizen and the special immigrant inspector of the United States. The facts in the case very briefly are as follows:

On the afternoon of May 8, 1905, Marcus Braun, then a guest of the Hotel Hungaria, in the city of Budapest, Hungary, saw one of the state detectives of the Royal Hungarian Government, by the name of Hugo Kalmar, taking out and reading Mr. Braun's personal and official letters. The detective was just in the act of reading a letter written by Dr. Frank Dyer Chester, United States consul-general at Budapest, to Mr. Braun relating to emigration matters in Hungary, which Mr. Braun was at the time officially investigating on behalf of the United States Government.

Many weeks before, let me say, Mr. Braun had complained to the United States consul-general at Budapest; to the Hon. Bellamy Storer, United States ambassador at Vienna, and also to the Commissioner-General of Immigration of the United States, that his mail, both official and private, was tampered with, but up to that time he was under the impression that the spoliation of his letters was caused by the post-office department of the Kingdom of Hungary, but when he caught Detective Kalmar red-handed in the act he had positive evidence that the opening of his mail was caused direct by the Hungarian Government.

Mr. Braun recognized in the person of this detective the man who for weeks prior to this incident had followed him on all the trips he was making in the capacity of United States immigrant inspector throughout that country, and when he caught this detective in the act of rifling his letters he gave expression to his indignation and denounced the act as outrageous, and immediately telegraphed to the United States ambassador at Vienna and to his superiors at Washington for protection and intervention.

The day following, namely, on the 9th day of May, Mr. Braun was served with a summons to appear before the police captaincy of the fourth district of the city of Budapest, on May 10, to answer a charge of insulting a royal Hungarian official. Consul-general Chester went with Mr. Braun to the chief of police, Mr. Bela Rudnay, to demand an explanation, and he also called on the councilor of the ministry of interior, Dr. Alexander Selley, and at both places they practically admitted that Mr. Braun was considered by them as a private person for the purpose of possibly detecting him in some offense against the Hungarian emigration law and to make his further stay impossible in that country as an American inspector of immigration.

The evidence secured by Mr. Braun and Consul-General Chester showed conclusively that the reason for this action by the Hungarian Government was that Mr. Braun's reports of 1904 had hurt the feelings of several prominent officials in the Adrea Steamship Company, which is a concern subsidized by the Hungarian Government, in which many of the highest officials of the Kingdom of Hungary are shareholders. At the beginning both the ministry of interior and the police department, including Detective Kalmar, denied the fact that they had opened Mr. Braun's mail or followed him around, but when they were confronted with the evidence in Mr. Braun's possession they made a brazen stand and said: "Well, we had a perfect right to do that. What are you going to do about it?"

By direct order of Prime Minister Tisza the police department issued official statements to the press against Mr. Braun, and paid the expenses for printing and circulating a pamphlet which was sold openly all over the Kingdom, which pamphlet contained all kinds of false charges against the honor and integrity of Mr. Braun.

The Hungarian Government did all this in spite of the fact that in 1897, at the time when Mr. Braun became a citizen of the United States, they had issued, upon his petition, official documents discharging him from all further allegiance to the Hungarian Kingdom, and then gave him a certificate from the civil and military authorities certifying that Mr. Braun had an absolutely clean record. More particularly, one document from the royal criminal court signed by the presiding justice and addressed to the mayor of the city of Budapest, when the latter, as prescribed by law, inquired whether or not there was anything pending against Mr. Braun, who had demanded a certificate of discharge from the country of his nativity. The document in question when translated reads as follows:

[Royal criminal court of justice, Budapest, No. 63722, 1897.]

To the honorable Mayor's Office of the Capital and Residence City of Budapest, Budapest:

To your inquiry in the matter of Marcus Braun, No. 25609, and dated July 4, 1897, I have the honor to inform you with official respect that there is no criminal procedure against the individual in question under way at this court, and that no sentence has been brought which should be executed upon him.

Budapest, September 16, 1897.

Doctor SALZER, Clerk.

And another document issued by the Royal Hungarian ministry of interior, and also addressed to the mayor, which, translated, reads as follows:

[Royal Hungarian ministry of the interior, No. 123707, 1898.]

To the Mayor of the Capital and Residence City of Budapest:

Marcus Braun, who was born in 1865, resident of New York, is, in the meaning of Article I of the State's Treaty incorporated in Law XLIII of the year 1871, to be considered as a citizen of the United States of America. Whereof I inform the honorable mayor, returning the documents sent with your report, No. 38413, of October 15th of the current year, as well as the petitioner's certificate of citizenship, for further proper action and calling upon you to communicate my above declaration as soon as possible to the petitioner, attaching his documents.

Budapest, December 3, 1898.

JAKABFFY, State Secretary.

Mr. Braun, on the 10th day of May, was fined against his protests, at the captaincy of the fourth district, Budapest, 50 crowns, about $10 in our money, which he had to pay immediately. He remained in Budapest until the 26th of May, and during that time he supplied the ambassador in Vienna with all the necessary evidence as to the outrageous treatment to which he had been subjected, and then suddenly received orders from his superiors in Washington to quit the Austro-Hungarian Monarchy and proceed elsewhere in pursuance to his instructions to investigate conditions governing emigration from other countries.

Not knowing how his cause had been disposed of and finding that through the great publicity that was given to his case all over Europe he could not do justice to his mission because he had been charged in the public prints by the Government of Austro-Hungary with serious criminal offenses, Mr. Braun returned to the United States and demanded an investigation and that justice be done him in the case, which thus far has been denied to him in all respects.

Now, a few words in conclusion. I want to say that Mr. Braun lives in my district. I know him well, and I can testify that he is an able, industrious, intelligent, and affable man. He has been an efficient official of this Government for several years and has won the esteem of his official superiors. He is a friend of President Roosevelt, who reposes in him the most implicit confidence. The charges filed against him secretly in the State Department by the Austro-Hungarian Government are absolutely false, and that Government knows the charges to be false. A great wrong and a great injustice has been done Mr. Braun by Austria. We should have all the facts in this case. Mr. Braun demands that all the papers in this matter secretly filed in the State Department by the Austro-Hungarian Government be given the fullest publicity so that the truth shall be known, and in order that Mr. Braun may be vindicated and seek such redress in the premises as may be just and proper this resolution should be adopted, and I hope the Secretary of State will comply with it speedily and send us all the papers in this case as soon as possible. I can not understand why there should be any secrecy about these papers, unless it is to shield guilty officials in Austro-Hungary or screen derelict officials here. But the truth in this case will prevail sooner or later, and we shall, I believe, ere long know all the facts in this contemptible conspiracy and outrageous trespass on the rights and the dignity of a well-known and popular American citizen and a high and distinguished official of the United States. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The question is on the House agreeing to the motion of the gentleman from New York to discharge the committee.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. SULZER, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

COMMITTEE ON REVISION OF THE LAWS.

Mr. MOON of Pennsylvania. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the resolution which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOON] asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of the following resolution, which will be reported by the Clerk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Revision of the Laws be authorized to order such printing and binding done as may be required in the transaction of its business.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The resolution was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. Also the following resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Revision of the Laws, or any subcommittee they may designate, shall have leave to sit during the sessions of the House during the Fifty-ninth Congress.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The resolution was agreed to.

INTERSTATE CORPORATION LICENSES.

Mr. POLLARD. Mr. Speaker, a few days ago I introduced a bill (H. R. 10704) which was, I think, by mistake, referred to the Committee on the Judiciary. I should like unanimous consent to have the Judiciary Committee discharged from further consideration of this bill, and that it be referred to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the title of the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 10704) to require all corporations engaged in commerce with the several States, with the Territories, and with foreign nations to secure a license from the General Government, and to impose a license fee for the same.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman asks unanimous consent that the reference of the bill be changed from the Judiciary Committee to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce. Is there objection?

Mr. PARKER. May I ask whether Mr. JENKINS, chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary, has been consulted about this?

Mr. POLLARD. No, sir.

Mr. PARKER. It seems to me that such consultation should be had. I have no desire to occupy any time with the matter, but I simply wished to know whether Mr. JENKINS had been consulted.

Mr. PERKINS. I will state that the Judiciary Committee is now in session, and no member of the committee is in the House.

Mr. PARKER. I shall ask the gentleman, then, to postpone his request.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New Jersey objects.

PHILIPPINE TARIFF BILL.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House now resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of House bill No. 3—the Philippine tariff bill.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, with Mr. OLMSTED in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is now in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of House bill No. 3—the Philippine tariff bill. General debate having been concluded, the Clerk will read the bill by paragraphs.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, before this bill is read I wish to have an understanding. Ordinarily the bill would be read by sections, and at the end of a section an amendment would be offered. I want to have a fair understanding about it, whether we can offer an amendment at the end of a clause or at the end of a proposition, or shall we have to wait until the end of the section.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Chairman, the bill is all in one section, and I submit that under the rule the section should be read, and then it will be subject to anything germane to that section.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. That is all right.

The CHAIRMAN. The understanding of the Chair is that this bill consists of one section, and that the second section is an amendment to be offered by the Committee on Ways and Means. There is only one section amending the act of which this is supplemental.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that there is so much confusion that we can not hear what the Chair says.

The CHAIRMAN. The point is well taken. The Chair will again state that House bill No. 3, before the committee, consists of one section only, and an amendment to that, to be offered by the Ways and Means Committee, in the shape of section 2. The second section is printed in the bill in italics. The Chair understands that that is an amendment to be offered by the Committee on Ways and Means. The Clerk will read the first section of the bill, and when it is concluded amendments will be in order.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the second section of the act entitled "An act temporarily to provide revenue for the Philippine Islands, and for other purposes," approved March 8, 1902, is hereby amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 2. That on and after the passage of this act there shall be levied, collected, and paid upon all articles coming into the United States from the Philippine Islands the rates of duty which are required to be levied, collected, and paid upon like articles imported from foreign countries: Provided, That all articles wholly the growth and product of the Philippine Islands coming into the United States from the Philippine Islands shall hereafter be admitted free of duty, except sugar and tobacco, manufactured and unmanufactured, upon which there shall be levied, collected, and paid only 25 per cent of the rates of duty aforesaid: And provided further, That the rates of duty which are required hereby to be levied, collected, and paid upon products of the Philippine Islands coming into the United States shall be less any duty or taxes levied, collected, and paid thereon upon the shipment thereof from the Philippine Islands, as provided by the act of the United States Philippine Commission referred to in section 1 of this act, under such rules and regulations as the Secretary of the Treasury may prescribe; but all articles the growth and product of the Philippine Islands admitted into the ports of the United States free of duty under the provisions of this act, and coming directly from said islands to the United States for use and consumption therein, shall be hereafter exempt from any export duties imposed in the Philippine Islands: Provided, however, That in consideration of the rates of duty aforesaid, all articles wholly the growth and product of the United States, going into the Philippine Islands, shall hereafter be admitted free of duty, except sugar and tobacco, manufactured and unmanufactured, upon which no higher rate of duty shall be levied, collected, and paid than is laid upon articles of like character coming from the Philippine Islands into the United States: And provided further, That on and after the 11th day of April, 1909, all articles and merchandise going from the United States into the Philippine Islands, and all articles wholly the growth and product of the Philippine Islands coming into the United States from the Philippine Islands, shall be admitted free of duty: And provided further, That in addition to said duty when levied and in case said articles are admitted into the United States free of duty, there shall be paid upon articles of merchandise of Philippine Islands manufacture coming into the United States and withdrawn for consumption or sale a tax equal to the internal-revenue tax imposed in the United States upon the like articles of merchandise of domestic manufacture; such tax to be paid by internal-revenue stamp or stamps to be purchased and provided by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue and to be procured from the collector of internal revenue at or most convenient to the port of entry of said merchandise in the United States, and to be affixed under such regulations as the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, shall prescribe, and such articles of Philippine Islands manufacture mentioned in this proviso shall be exempt from payment of any tax imposed by the internal-revenue laws of the Philippine Islands: And provided further, That in addition to the duty hereinbefore provided when levied and in case said articles are admitted into the Philippine Islands free of duty, there shall be paid upon articles of merchandise manufactured in the United States and going into the Philippine Islands and withdrawn for consumption or sale, a tax equal to the internal-revenue tax imposed in the Philippine Islands upon the like articles of merchandise when manufactured in the Philippine Islands; such tax to be paid by internal-revenue stamps or otherwise as provided by the laws in force in the Philippine Islands upon the like articles; and such articles manufactured in the United States mentioned in this proviso and going into the Philippine Islands shall be exempt from payment of any tax imposed by the internal-revenue laws of the United States. All the moneys collected under this section as amended shall be paid over and disposed of as provided in section 4 of the act hereby amended, and shall not be covered into the Treasury of the United States."

Mr. PAYNE. Now, Mr. Chairman, I offer the first committee amendment. On page 2, line 13, after the word "articles," insert the word "wholly."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Chairman, I offer the second committee amendment, which I ask the Clerk to read.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 2, line 21, after the word "however," strike out all remaining on that page down to and including the words "United States," line 3, page 3, and insert in lieu thereof the following: "And in consideration of the rates of duty aforesaid sugar and tobacco, both manufactured and unmanufactured, wholly the growth and product of the United States, shall be admitted to the Philippine Islands from the United States free of duty."

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will ask the gentleman from New York if the word "however," line 21, is a part of his amendment?

Mr. PAYNE. I think the word "however" remains in the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from New York.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PAYNE. Now, Mr. Chairman, I offer the amendment in lines 21 and 22, on page 3.

The Clerk read as follows:

In lines 21 and 22, page 3, strike out the words "purchased and," and insert in line 23 the words "by purchase," after the word "procured."

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PAYNE. I now offer the amendment to section 2 proposed by the committee, beginning on page 4, line 24.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, that is not in order yet.

Mr. PAYNE. I do not know why it is not in order.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Section 2 has not yet been read.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will call the attention of the gentleman from New York to what appears to be a further committee amendment on page 4, line 16. The Clerk suggests that the word "island" should be "islands."

Mr. PAYNE. I ask, Mr. Chairman, that the word "island" be changed to "islands."

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PAYNE. I will withhold the offer of the amendment as to section 2, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. Mr. Chairman, I move to amend this section in the following manner.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out in lines 5 and 6, page 2, the word "twenty-five" and insert the word "sixty." Strike out all after the word "duty," in line 7, page 3, down to and including the word "duty," in line 13.

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. Mr. Chairman, this is one of the most important and far-reaching measures that Congress will be called upon to meet during the present session. In my judgment, it is destined to be harmful both to the Philippine Islands and the United States. It holds out a false and unsubstantial inducement to those island people, and tends to destroy confidence in the stability of our policy toward the sugar growers and to discourage capital from going into this attractive and useful field of enterprise. It had not been my intention to take any part in this debate, and I should not do so now were the questions involved less important than they are to my State and to the country. The debate has been both interesting and instructive, splendidly illustrating the capacity of Members, new and old, and adding new interest to this great forum of the people. I believe in liberality of debate and the widest possible latitude for the individual Member under reasonable rules. Able speeches have been made on both sides, and it is with the greatest reluctance that I am forced by my convictions to disagree with my associates upon the Committee on Ways and Means, all of whom I greatly respect and with whose judgment I rarely disagree. Far be it from my purpose to question the sincerity or motive of any Member upon this floor. I cheerfully attest the patriotic purpose which animates the distinguished chairman of the Ways and Means, whose purity of purpose, high ideals, and lofty character are an inspiration to us all. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, I shall not narrowly view the question before us. I serve no special interest. I make no hostile criticism of the Filipino, whose regeneration we have undertaken. They are our wards, for weal or woe; they did not force themselves upon us; they are here because of the accident of war, and should be treated fairly. The problem confronting the Representatives of the people is a most delicate and responsible one, growing out of the circumstances of our occupation. It is the office of true statesmanship to approach this question mindful of every interest involved, and act with honor and independence. [Applause.] We would be unfaithful to our trust should we follow blindly the leadership of any man, and I should have little respect for any Member here who deliberately falls into the dilemma of taking his opinions upon public questions ready-made from any source, no matter how high. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, one of the most royal battles ever waged in the commercial world directly concerns the production of sugar; the ordinary implements of warfare have been put aside while a trade battle is now going on around the globe. It is a struggle for existence, and for supremacy, not with Mauser rifles or rapid-firing cannon, but with the yardstick and the tariff schedules. Advantages are sought! Reprisals given in every market, upon every island, dependency, and possession the wide world over! Experts sit in the commercial conning towers watching the movement of fiscal systems, and business calculations are as accurately made as astronomer or scientist ever foretold. Sir, America is the object of their immediate concern. With our exclusive industrial policy we can not, in the future, hope for any wider latitude in commerce than we are willing to give. As the world progresses, each country caring for its own, the wisdom of Washington and Hamilton in so regulating our affairs as to leave us least dependent upon others can not be to heartily acclaimed.

The sugar war now being waged is of our own choosing. So long as the policy of our Government did not distinguish between nations, giving all equal treatment under our laws, no difficulties beset us. Our favoritism of Hawaii in 1876 was viewed with concern in the sugar-producing world, and we have paid dearly for our exploitation. Under the stimulus of American concessions that island has increased its sugar production from 10,000 tons in 1876 to 370,000 tons in 1905. The duties remitted during that time amounted to $158,000,000, a sum exceeding by $10,000,000 the total value of all our exports to that island in thirty years. This preference was thought by many European States to be in violation of the favored-nation clause of our commercial treaties. The disposition of the leading countries of the world was to increase their sugar supply. Continental Europe, with large agricultural area, stimulated production to the highest point by protective duties, bounties, and cartels, Germany alone having produced over 16,000,000 tons under that system, until confronted with the problem of overproduction. The United States had been a good customer for European sugars, taking in 1900 nearly 400,000 tons, although our country had land in abundance suitable for sugar production. The sugar war was on in earnest. The fifth section of the Dingley law, in addition to protecting our domestic industry, lodged with the Secretary of the Treasury authority to impose a countervailing duty against any foreign product coming into this market equal to any bounty paid. This ban was instantly resisted. Secretary Gage applied it to Russia when the steamship Assyria undertook to land its cargo of sugar in Baltimore Harbor. Russia resisted the action of our Government in the courts, and failing of success, Mr. Witte, then chancellor of the exchequer, and now prime minister of the Empire, put a ban upon every American product except agricultural implements.

The decision of the Supreme Court, reported in 187 United States, fixed the status of bountyized sugar in this market. A hasty conference of sugar-producing countries was called. The Brussels convention, composed of Great Britain, Germany, Austria, Bohemia, Belgium, Spain, France, Italy, Netherlands, Sweden, Norway, and Roumania, hastily resolved to meet the situation by discontinuing sugar bounties in every form. Germany and other States suddenly realized that they had a vast surplus sugar product upon their hands, with no market. England, the only open European port, felt that she had been unfairly treated. Her West Indian colonies could find no market for their sugar, because they could not compete with the bounty-fed sugar in her own market, which might be sold at a loss, if necessary, with the cartel and the bounty to sustain them, while the favoritism bestowed by the United States upon Hawaii, Cuba, and Porto Rico made it impossible to market their product here. All sugar-producing countries paying full Dingley rates feel keenly the loss of our markets, Great Britain especially, because of the proximity of her islands to our shores. She is our best European customer. Her purchases from us last year amounted to over $523,000,000—more than one-third of the total foreign commerce of our country. Is it any wonder that the disposition of England dominated the Brussels convention? affording the world an open market. She could not even buy the sugar of her colonies at the world's price.

We had formerly taken nearly 100,000 tons of sugar from the British West Indies. Last year we took but 32,000 tons. Because of our relations to Porto Rico we have taken of her sugar 94,504 tons in 1905, as against 32,316 tons in 1900. Europe has practically lost our market for sugar. In 1900 we imported 390,820 tons of beet sugar, while last year we imported but 3,671 tons. Cuba, under the stimulus of our concessions sold us over 1,000,000 tons last year, as against 246,587 tons in 1900. Our domestic beet sugar has increased from 32,471 tons in 1899 to 285,000 tons in 1900; Hawaii, from 100,680 tons in 1890 to 370,000 tons in 1905. The Philippine Islands under the present law sold in this market 44,841 tons last year, as against 2,550 tons in 1902; 22,100 tons in 1904. These remarkable figures demonstrate beyond question that our discrimination against Europe has not been calculated to strengthen our commercial bonds, while we are fast approaching a situation here when nondutiable sugars invited to this market will discourage and overthrow our domestic production. We are already within 10 per cent of our ability to consume. The estimated consumption of 1906, furnished by Willett & Gray, is 2,745,295 tons, while their latest estimate of crops now making is:

			Tons.
(Estimated consumption, 1906)			2,745,295
Louisiana		300,000
Texas		12,000
U. S. beet		285,000
Porto Rico		210,000
Hawaii		370,000
Duty free		1,177,000
Philippines	125,000
Cuba	1,300,000
	1,425,000
Less local consumption in islands	80,000
Partially duty free		1,345,000
Total privileged sugar			2,522,000
Leaving full-duty sugar required for the United States consumption of 1906 against 438,383 tons in 1905 and 645,733 tons in 1904			223,295

These are most astounding figures, calling a halt in our tariff concessions. No one knows the sugar capacity of the Philippine Islands. They have, under crude conditions, produced as high as 300,000 tons; while a distinguished French statist has recently said that Cuba has the soil and the climate to produce 5,000,000 tons of sugar a year. With this rapid development of growth and production the world over are we not reckless to invite our islands, 10,000 miles away, into a contest for which they are so poorly equipped where the prospects of profitable realization are so remote?

I believe this legislation, so far as sugar is concerned, will be most harmful to the Philippines. Their market here is surrounded by unfavorable conditions—within the grasp of a single corporation. Can we not, by the adoption of the amendment which I propose, reduce this duty 40 or even 50 per cent of the Dingley law, retain for them the Hongkong and the Asiatic markets, nearer their doors, with greater promise than our own? I contend that the effect of the Brussels sugar convention will operate to deprive the Philippine Islands of their sugar market at Hongkong whenever our concessions have exceeded the limit of 50 cents per 100 pounds allowed by the convention.

I know, Mr. Chairman, it may be said that China and Japan are not parties to the Brussels Convention, that Hongkong is a free port, and that this legislation does not call for retaliation. Hongkong is a dependency of Great Britain. Her governor-general, at the instance of England, did prohibit Philippine sugars from entering Hongkong for nearly two years after the signing of the Brussels Convention, because of protective duties levied by the American-Philippine Commission of 73 cents per 100 pounds against the sugars of the world. It was the cancellation of this embargo, pending further investigation into our action here, that restored the Hongkong market temporarily to Philippine sugar. It has been said that the passage of this measure would assist the Filipino to obtain higher prices in China for his sugar. All sugars going to China pass through Hongkong for refining. It is most important—indeed it is vital—that this outlet be kept open for Philippine sugars. The passage of the present bill reducing the duty exceeds the permissible surtax and brings the Philippine product in direct conflict with the Brussels Convention. Hongkong has followed the lead of Great Britain in the past; their interests are identical. My amendment will preserve to the Philippines every market now open to their product and give them for their necessities the revenues, amounting to $2,125,000 a year, as against $887,500 under the bill as proposed. The actual saving in revenue with which to meet the expenses of the island government will be $1,238,000, which they sadly need. A reduction of 25 per cent of the Dingley rates will greatly curtail their income, while free trade in 1909 will force their hands into the general Treasury. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, I can not understand where this proposition was born. It is neither in the interest of the Filipinos or the American people. It is the result of the most mawkish sentimentality and has in it the seed of disappointment, disaster, and ill will as soon as its fruits are realized. Whenever any government grant exceeds 50 cents per 100 pounds, every signatory country under the Brussels Convention must assess a countervailing duty equal to such excess or prohibit the importation entirely. Countries outside the convention have done the same as those inside. Hongkong prohibits, as it is a free port having no duties. The convention has a permanent committee to take action on any new infringement. Mexico and Brazil, lying at the south of us, formerly conferred benefits similar to that provided for in this bill. Finding themselves unable to get their sugars into any European market, both countries revised their fiscal policy in harmony with the convention, Brazil taking final action since this debate begun, giving as a reason that "With the British markets closed, and only the American market to rely on, we should be at the mercy of the first combination of buyers in America that agreed to fix a maximum price for our sugars." Even States as remote from Europe as our own have found it necessary to join this anti-American concert. Who is to guarantee to the Philippine sugar producer a profit or even a fair price for his product? Mr. De la Rama, in his testimony before the Ways and Means Committee, fixed his price for sugar on the New York market practically prohibitive. With but one customer in America, will the situation of the Filipino not prove as aggravating as the condition which stared Brazil in the face? With his ability and shrewdness, this able Philippine merchant and planter maintained before our committee the great desirability of the Hongkong and Chinese markets. This bill, if passed, will drive him from the Hongkong market, without a single compensating advantage in the market of our own country. Why imperil their prospects in the East by this uncalled for and unnecessary action? Why pledge our Government in advance to strike down every barrier between us, when no one can foretell whether it will be possible or desirable in the immediate future? "Pride goeth before a fall," and I am afraid that some of my associates, still dreaming of the official hospitality of which they have recently been the recipients, are going further than prudence would suggest in their endeavor to justify the expectation of their hosts. Our sugar policy will drive every foreign State in the Eastern and Western hemispheres into combination against us, and when our productive capacity equals our ability to consume, now dangerously near realization, we will have learned a most costly lesson in disaster. [Applause.]

Forty per cent reduction of the Dingley rates grants the Philippines a benefit of 50 cents per 100 pounds and carries no penalty with it. Fifty per cent reduction gives the Filipino 65 cents per 100 pounds, possibly avoiding a penalty, while the present bill grants a benefit of 97 cents per 100 pounds and practically closes every market in the world against them. Estimating this reckless remission of duty upon a product of 200,000 tons of sugar it would amount to $4,000,000 a year, and in five years would equal the amount paid under the Paris treaty of $20,000,000. Will Europe take action? They have already excluded more than three and a half million tons of sugar from their markets, and most of the countries resting under their ban lie close to our shores, including Argentina, Haiti, Honduras, Nicaragua, and Paraguay. Who can tell when this Government may be called upon to administer the customs of every tropical State at the south of us, as we are now doing in Santo Domingo, and how long will it be before they petition us to put them upon an equality in our market with their neighbor, Cuba? Our protective system was far more interesting to look upon before these breaches were made in the wall. The American farmers are the most substantial bulwark of our political system. They were willing to concede protection to the manufacturer when, under the same law, a profitable market was preserved for the products of their soil. The leaders of the Republican party have never plead in vain to the farmers of America to resist fallacious fallacies, but I call the attention of the House to the fact that the only schedule altered in the Dingley law has been the agricultural schedule, bringing the products of cheap lands and cheap labor into competition with our own. [Applause.]

There is not a prosperous free-trade country in the world to-day! Why break down our system piecemeal? The gentleman from Massachusetts, a few days ago, demanded greater freedom of trade. He would have us abandon our policy of protection just at a time when all the world is engaged in strengthening trade laws. Freedom of trade indeed! Poor England has the bitter cup to her lips. Neglecting for years her domestic market; devoting herself to her export trade, the doors of the world have finally been closed against her; her idle men blacken the streets of her capital from Trafalgar Square to London Bridge. More than 3,000,000 of her workmen idle in the dead of winter. A vast fund collected by Her Gracious Majesty to relieve the suffering of the unemployed is spurned with the slogan that they are "not asking for charity, but want work." Freedom of trade! Yes, such freedom of trade as exists under practically similar conditions between the States of the Federal Union. Not such freedom of trade as the gentleman from Massachusetts would bestow, which has brought Ireland, with its sunshine and its green fields, with its mines and its forests, with its lakes and its rivers, to the very verge of destitution, but that freedom of trade existing between Michigan and Massachusetts [applause], between South Carolina and Tennessee, amounting in the aggregate to more than $55,000,000 a day, from whose refreshing spring the artisan, the farmer, and the mechanic draws his daily inspiration, making America the most prosperous and happy land in all the world. [Applause].

Yet Massachusetts would strike down this principle of protection—Massachusetts—having drawn much of her fabulous wealth from the fertile fields, the stately forests, and rich mines of our western territory, protected in its prosperity by American law. Mr. Chairman, there is not a prosperous country in the world to-day that does not protect its commerce and its labor from ruinous competition. Germany, yes; France, yes; even Canada and Australia have cast off the commercial yoke of England, and a public sentiment, numerous indeed, encourages the warfare upon free trade now being waged in that Empire by Joseph Chamberlain. At such a time why should we change? Why should we compromise with error? Why should we lower our banner—carried so proudly and triumphantly by the great leaders of our party, whose names will live forever in the history of our country? [Applause.]

What we need is a renewed baptism in the spirit of the fathers. "The first duty of the American Congress is to the American people." Have we grown so weak that we are sensitive to criticism? That has always been the weapon of our opponents. Every step in the progress of the American people has been resisted by the Democracy; it has cursed and criticised our party from the hour that Fremont bore its banner to defeat; maligned and traduced it under the heroic leadership of Lincoln and Grant; misrepresented by the tongue of slander the leadership of the matchless and inspired McKinley. But, thank God, we still stand with practical unanimity the recognized guardian of the nation's honor. [Prolonged applause.]

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Chairman, the principal part of the announcement of the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH] is not new, but has been heard before since we began the first hearings upon that question. The ghost of the Brussels convention was trotted out with much solemnity by another gentleman from Michigan on the hearings before the committee, and before those hearings ended there was not even a shadow of the ghost left in the deliberations of the committee.

It is not true, Mr. Chairman, that there ever has been any countervailing duty in any country in the world because of any Filipino tariff or any Filipino bounty. There has been no countervailing duty anywhere in the world because we have given the same legislation to Porto Rico; and after these gentlemen had presented their case and were done I answered them simply by a dispatch from Minister Wilson, at Brussels, in which he said that the matter of interference with the Brussels convention by our tariff rates with the Filipinos and by their tariff rates, as in the case of Porto Rico and of Cuba, had been finally passed upon by the convention, and the dispatch said that the matter was regarded definitely as settled. And now, in the last hour of this debate, comes in the gentleman from Michigan, and with tears in his voice he proclaims himself the friend of the Filipino. The good Lord deliver the poor Filipino from such friends as the gentleman from Michigan. [Applause.] What would he do? He would strip this bill of all idea of benefit to the Filipino and would put this duty at 60 per cent of the Dingley rates, knowing that under it they could not get in their sugar here at a price that would net them a single farthing. And the gentleman proclaims that as a benefit to the Filipino people.

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH rose.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from New York yield to the gentleman from Michigan?

Mr. PAYNE. No; I have only five minutes. The gentleman had half an hour. I can not yield to him. The gentleman knows his proposition will be of no benefit to the Filipino people. He says we are going to cut off their market with Hongkong, when he knows or should know that the question has been definitely settled in regard to Porto Rico, upon the same conditions that exist here.

Mr. Chairman, I read the telegram when I first addressed the committee. I have stated the contents of the telegram now. I will go further and state from a communication which I have on my desk—a private, confidential communication—that this matter was definitely settled by the Brussels convention.

Mr. Chairman, we propose to give the Filipino a chance in this bill. The gentleman from Michigan would wipe it out. He wipes it out by mere declamation, and he comes in as the pretended friend of the Filipino people when he makes that statement. Mr. Chairman, I hope the committee will vote down this amendment offered by the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to have read the telegram from Mr. Minister Wilson, found upon page 194 of the Philippine Tariff Hearings before the Ways and Means Committee, to which the gentleman from New York referred. I send it to the Clerk's desk.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Michigan asks unanimous consent to have sent to the Clerk's desk and there read a certain telegram to which he has referred. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

Permanent sugar commission sitting at Brussels suppressed compensating duty on sugars imported from Philippine Islands until new examination of Philippine regulations is made in conjunction with the legislation of the United States of America, Cuba, and Porto Rico. Question believed to be definitely settled as regards Philippine sugar.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Chairman, I commiserate the great body of able gentlemen on both sides of this House who have spoken in opposition to this bill because of the discovery now made of their entire incompetence for the business in which they were engaged. [Laughter.] Fifty hours of debate, about equally divided between the ablest men on the one side and some of the ablest men on the other side did not produce this tremendous ghost of the Brussels convention. Why did it not? It had been thoroughly studied, carefully considered in the Committee on Ways and Means, understood by friends of the bill and enemies of the bill, that there was nothing in it.

In the first place, our tariff on the Philippines is the Philippine tariff, and the Philippine tariff on their own productions is our tariff. It is not covered either directly or indirectly by any action of the Brussels convention, and it was laid aside and postponed and disposed of prior to the recent telegram the chairman has received, because it was not covered by anything connected with the Brussels convention, and that body had nothing to do with it, and the ghost ceased to walk. We all understood it, and the gentlemen who did not speak during the fifty hours of debate sprung it on us as something absolutely wonderful. I knew what he was going to do, and I regretted that he should do it. There is no more power, no more force, no more significance in any action, or failure to act, in the Brussels convention than there is in the power and efficiency of the Hartford convention of 1812, and you might as well quote one as the other. [Laughter and applause.]

I have said this much, not to affect the vote, but to right the able gentlemen who have gone over all the phases of this contest and never knew that this trouble was in the way until it was exploited by the gentleman.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Ohio says that the action of the Brussels convention has not heretofore been alluded to on this floor. If I recollect rightly, while the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE] was making his speech I made some inquiries of him relative to the effect that the action of the Brussels convention would have if this bill became a law. I think that there can be no question in the minds of any gentlemen who have followed the action of the Brussels convention but that the moment we give the Philippines, Porto Rico, Cuba, or any other exporting sugar country an advantage over other sugar-producing territories, above the one-half cent a pound allowed by the Brussels conference, all exports from such territory to the markets of the nations signatory to the Brussels convention will be met by a countervailing duty.

If that is not so, the action of the Brussels conference has been entirely without avail. The only reason why Porto Rico has not been countervailed against is that she has shipped no sugar to any of the countries signatory to the Brussels convention. The only reason why Cuba has not been countervailed against is that our preferential has not equaled one-half a cent a pound, and the only reason why the Philippines have not been countervailed against, if they have not, is that up to this time the preferential comes within the limit of tolerance fixed by the Brussels conference.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I support this, not only because it will avoid complications such as the gentleman from Michigan has eloquently and clearly pointed out, but because rather than to have this bill in all its iniquity as it now stands, we prefer to give the Filipinos a further reduction in our tariff than they have at present. Not that they need it, in my opinion. I believe that the present reduction of 25 per cent in the Dingley rate puts the Philippine sugar producer on more than an equality with the American sugar producer. I do not believe they require further protection to stimulate their industry in the Philippines. Such bounties have never been needed and up to this time have never been granted to any tropical cane-sugar country of any area. Let us be fair, aye, let us be more than fair; let us be liberal and vote for this amendment.

Mr. CASSEL. Mr. Chairman, I will take but a moment to say that these amendments are substantially what I stated the other day to the House that I would offer when the bill was read for amendment, and they are perfectly satisfactory to us. I hope those interested in the production of tobacco will support these amendments.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Michigan. The Chair will state that they are in the nature of two separate amendments.

Mr. COOPER of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, let the amendments be again read.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the Clerk will again read the amendments.

The Clerk read the amendments.

The CHAIRMAN. If there be no objection, the question will be taken on the amendments together.

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. The last amendment, Mr. Chairman, refers to free trade in 1909.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to taking the question on the amendments together? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. MONDELL) there were—ayes 73, noes 197.

So the amendments were lost.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I wish to know whether amendments may be offered to any portion of the bill after the bill has been read in its entirety?

The CHAIRMAN. The bill consists of but one section, which has been read in its entirety, and amendments may be offered to any portion of it.

Mr. MONDELL. I asked whether amendments to any portion of the bill can be offered at this time.

The CHAIRMAN. The bill consists of one section, which has been read, and amendments may be offered to any part of that section.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Chairman, I am afraid you did not understand the gentleman from Wyoming. He wants to know substantially whether an amendment to section 1 could be offered after section 1 is passed. I understand we are under the ordinary rules of the House. That being the case, of course amendments to section 1 could not be offered after section 1 had been entered upon.

The CHAIRMAN. Of course after the committee shall have finally perfected and passed by section 1 and agreed to or passed upon additional sections, amendments to the first section could only be offered by unanimous consent.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I was afraid the gentleman misunderstood you.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, I want fair warning when we get through with this section 1. That is, I do not want to be shut out from offering an amendment by somebody claiming that we had got on section 2 and that we could not amend section 1 any more.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state there is no section 2 in this bill.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Oh, yes, there is.

The CHAIRMAN. That which is printed as section 2 is merely an indication of an amendment which the Chair understands the Committee on Ways and Means intends to offer.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Then any time before we report this bill out of committee anybody can put in any amendment to any part of it he pleases.

The CHAIRMAN. Any time before the committee has passed by section 1 to other matters—additional sections—anybody can offer an amendment which is applicable to that section. When what is printed here in italics in the bill as section 2 is offered as an amendment, of course an amendment to that amendment may be offered; but after all the amendments which gentlemen desire to offer to section 1 have been offered and considered and the section passed by, no further amendment to section 1 would be in order except by unanimous consent.

Mr. SLAYDEN. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman from Texas state his parliamentary inquiry?

Mr. SLAYDEN. After section 1 shall have been adopted will it be in order to offer an amendment as an additional section?

The CHAIRMAN. After section 1 has been perfected by the committee it will be in order to offer an additional section.

Mr. WILLIAMS. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Mississippi will state his parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. WILLIAMS. This bill consists, as you say, now of one section. Then there is in the printed form of it a second section, but it is, however, a committee amendment, as I understand.

The CHAIRMAN. That is correct. An amendment agreed upon by the Ways and Means Committee, but not yet offered here, and not in order until section 1 has been disposed of.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Now, with that state of facts before us, at what stage would a substitute for the entire bill be entertained by the Chairman?

The CHAIRMAN. A substitute amendment might at any time be offered and considered pending, but could not be voted upon, under the rules and usages of the House, until after the bill itself has been perfected by the acceptance or rejection of such amendments as may be offered.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Chairman, I then ask to be recognized to offer as pending, to be voted upon later, a substitute, namely, H. R. 406. I ask that it may be considered pending now.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair, without objection, will at this point recognize the gentleman from Mississippi for that purpose, and he now asks that the substitute recommended by the minority of the Ways and Means Committee be considered as pending, to be voted upon when the bill shall have been perfected.

Mr. WILLIAMS. When the bill shall have been perfected, and not before.

Mr. PAYNE. I was waiting for that substitute to be read. Mr. Chairman, and I want to reserve the right of order upon it as not being germane.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understands the gentleman from New York reserves the point of order against the substitute amendment.

Mr. McCALL. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment, which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend by adding at the end of line 23, page 4, the following:

"And provided further, That nothing herein contained shall be construed to mean that it is the purpose of the Congress that the United States should permanently retain sovereignty over the Philippine Islands, but it is hereby solemnly declared to be the settled purpose of the Congress to fit the people of the said islands for self-government at the earliest practicable moment, and, when that result shall have been accomplished, to leave the government and control of the said islands to the people thereof, to the end that they shall be recognized by the United States as a free and independent nation, as was done in the case of Cuba."

[Applause.]

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that that amendment is not germane.

Mr. McCALL. Mr. Chairman, it is perfectly clear that the amendment——

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE] make or reserve his point of order?

Mr. PAYNE. I make it. I understand the gentleman from Massachusetts wants to be heard on the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. Very well; the Chair will hear the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. McCALL. I am not anxious to be heard on the point of order unless the Chair cares to hear me. I would say this is clearly a limitation on the bill. We have been sending tariffs and armies over to those islands, and I think the time has arrived when Congress should perform the duty imposed upon it by the treaty of Paris, which enjoined upon Congress the duty of settling ultimately the status of the Philippine Islands. We have pursued the policy of drift long enough, and of the two the policy of scuttle is no worse than the policy of drift. I think it is clearly expressive of the intention of Congress in passing tax laws against these people, in providing that their goods shall come to these markets under certain conditions, to declare that it is not our purpose permanently to retain sovereignty over them, but to declare what our purpose is. And I think it is just as much germane as a somewhat similar amendment was to the Philippine government bill, which was offered three years ago, and which even did not impress the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE] as not being in order.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Chairman, of course an amendment might be germane to one bill and not to another. The gentleman appeals to me because at some time I have not raised a point of order when an amendment like this was offered to a Philippine government bill. Well, a Philippine government bill is one thing and a revenue bill is another thing. This bill relates strictly to the revenue, and now comes in the gentleman and proposes a scheme for the separation of the island, self-government, autonomy, and all that sort of thing—a well-thought-of scheme, doubtless. It might work for a minute and a half, until they got to cutting each other's throat, and then, of course, the work would go on forever. That is the scheme which the gentleman presents, and it has no relation to a bill raising the revenue. Now, Mr. Chairman, I do not propose to discuss this matter any further at present, inasmuch as the Chair is familiar with the rules of the House.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Chairman, I desire to be heard on the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will hear the gentleman.

Mr. WILLIAMS. The gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE] has just said that this was a revenue bill. It is, and it is a revenue bill pending in the Congress of the United States for the Philippine Islands as well as for the balance of the United States. This amendment is a restriction, a limitation, an expression of how far we are going to go in the future in the business of legislating for the Philippines, not only upon all questions, but as a necessary result thereof upon revenue questions. In other words, this is a revenue bill and this amendment declares it to be the policy of the United States that after the happening of a certain contingency which acts as a limitation, or is destined or expected to act as a limitation, Congress will not legislate any more revenue bills for the Philippines. In other words, it fixes the policy of this country in connection with the interference of the United States with the revenue affairs of the Philippine Archipelago.

It is germane to this bill, because when we declare a policy, imitating with regard to the Philippines the policy already pursued as to Cuba, we declare a fiscal fact—a revenue fact—of the very highest importance to the Philippine Islands, upon whom partially this bill operates. It is germane, because we are now undertaking to treat the Philippine Islands—and I ask the Chair's attention to this—for the present, at any rate, as a part and parcel of the United States. Certainly, then, a declaration saying that we shall not always do that, but that upon the happening of a certain contingency we shall cease to do it, is germane to the spirit of the bill, at any rate. It is a limitation upon the intendment of the proposed legislation. In my opinion, the amendment is germane to the spirit of the bill. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

The CHAIRMAN. The requirement that an amendment must be germane to the bill or proposition to which it is offered has obtained since the beginning of the American Congress. It was adopted in the very first set of rules of this House, in 1789, and even before that had an important place among the rules governing the Continental Congress. In 1822 it was slightly modified in form and adopted in the following language:

No motion or proposition upon a subject different from that under consideration shall be admitted under color of amendment.

In that precise form it has been firmly embedded in our rules from that time down to the present moment and exists to-day in the last clause of section 7 of Rule XVI.

It is a great safeguard against hasty and ill-considered action. It prevents unexpected and diverse objects from being suddenly thrust forward for the instant consideration of the House without the benefit and assistance of previous consideration and report by the appropriate committee; protects the minority from the sudden springing and enactment by the majority of new propositions of which the minority has had no notice and no opportunity to prepare for discussion, and protects the majority from having to accept the responsibility of immediate action upon matters unexpectedly brought forward without previous committee consideration or report or opportunity for full information. It is for many reasons highly essential to the orderly and rational transaction of the business of this House. Without this rule as to germaneness new propositions of the utmost magnitude, deserving many days of discussion, as this bill has had, might, after the closing of general debate, be brought forward, as now, under color of amendment and debate thereon limited to five minutes on either side.

The five-minute rule itself, under which we are now proceeding, would hardly exist to-day except upon the assumption that the earlier rule as to germaneness will be strictly construed and faithfully adhered to.

The Speakers and presiding officers in Committee of the Whole House have almost uniformly interpreted and enforced it with great strictness. Perhaps the only exception was in the Thirty-fifth Congress, when Speaker Howell Cobb relaxed it somewhat, but soon thereafter, with his own tacit consent, it has been suggested, the House overruled him.

Speaker Reed, in the Fifty-first Congress, in a very elaborate discussion of it, said:

It is very desirable that this rule should be preserved in its entirety, and whatever might be the wish of the Chair on this question now before him for decision, he must decide with reference to all like matters and with reference to the general preservation of good order in the business of the House of Representatives.

And Mr. Carlisle, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole in the Forty-sixth Congress, and afterwards Speaker, said:

After a bill has been reported to the House, no different subject can be introduced into it by amendment, whether as a substitute or otherwise. When, therefore, it is objected that a proposed amendment is not in order because it is not germane, the meaning of the objection is merely that it (the proposed amendment) is a motion or proposition on a subject different from that under consideration. This is the test of admissibility prescribed by the express language of the rule, and if the Chair, upon an examination of the bill under consideration and the proposed amendment, shall be of the opinion that they do not relate to the same subject, he is bound to sustain the objection and exclude the amendment.

Now, applying the test suggested by Speaker Carlisle and indeed by the rule itself, the question is, Does this amendment contain a subject different from the subject-matter of the bill?

The object of the bill as expressed in its title is, "To amend an act entitled 'An act temporarily to provide revenue for the Philippine Islands, and for other purposes,' approved March 8, 1902."

Nowhere in the bill is there reference to or any attempt to legislate upon anything except the tariff upon articles coming from the Philippine Islands into the United States or going from the United States into the Philippine Islands.

Now, this proposed amendment declares that "it is the settled purpose of this Congress to fit the people of these islands for self-government at the earliest practicable moment."

That seems to the Chair to be a different proposition from the question of tariff upon articles coming from the Philippines.

The amendment further proposes, "when that result (their education) shall have been accomplished, to leave the government and control of said islands to the people thereof."

The people of the Philippines are at present governed in part, at least, by or subject to laws enacted by the Congress of the United States. There is nothing in the pending bill in any way touching the subject of their control, certainly not looking to any change therein. That seems to the Chair to be a different subject, introduced by the amendment. Then the amendment proceeds:

To the end that they shall be recognized by the United States as a free and independent nation, as was done in the case of Cuba.

The pending bill deals with them entirely as belonging to the United States. The amendment, on the other hand, proposes to give them independence. It seems to the Chair to be as plain as plain can be that there are at least two subjects in the amendment which are entirely different from anything in the bill itself.

Now, the Chair will call attention to one or two rulings which seem in point. In the first session of the Fifty-seventh Congress there was before the House in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union a bill to provide for reciprocal trade relations with Cuba. An amendment was offered to form a new section, providing for extending to the people of Cuba, through their duly authorized Government, an invitation to apply for annexation of that island to the United States. Mr. PAYNE, of New York, made the point of order that it was not germane, and after argument it was sustained by so distinguished a parliamentarian as the gentleman from New York [Mr. SHERMAN]. That seems to be almost directly in point.

In the second session of the Fifty-first Congress the House was considering a bill appropriating $50,000 out of any money in the Treasury for the relief of destitute persons in the island of Cuba. Mr. BAILEY of Texas moved to recommit the bill with instructions to amend thus:

That a condition of public war exists between the Government of Spain and the government proclaimed and for some time maintained by force of arms by the people of Cuba, and that the United States of America shall maintain a strict neutrality between the contending powers, according to each all the rights of belligerents.

After argument, Speaker Reed declared that amendment to be not germane, and upon an appeal from his ruling it was sustained by the House by a vote of 114 to 83. That seems to the Chair to be directly in point.

In the succeeding year a bill was before the House making appropriations for the diplomatic and consular service, and Mr. BAILEY again offered practically the same amendment, which the Speaker again ruled to be not germane.

There are two instances in which Speaker Reed ruled that an amendment according belligerent rights to the Cubans was not germane to other measures pending for their relief or in some way concerning them. Now, the only difference between that amendment which Speaker Reed ruled out and this proposed amendment to this bill is that this amendment proposes to go further and give them absolute independence. The Chair is clearly of opinion that the amendment is not germane, and therefore sustains the point of order.

Mr. McCALL. Mr. Chairman, I respectfully appeal from the decision of the Chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts appeals from the decision of the Chair. The question now is, Shall the decision of the Chair stand as the decision of the committee?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I desire to say a few words to the committee before the question is put. I ask for recognition.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama is recognized.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I wish to say this to the committee. The rule as to germaneness is one that was established early in the history of this Government, but that rule has been made in recent years as much by the exceptions as by the rule itself. There are many rules that we have in this House that, if you read the face of the rule, tell you that you can not introduce amendments, but when you take the precedents as established by this House you will find that you are allowed to introduce those amendments. The most familiar rule of that kind is the rule that provides that no new legislation shall go on appropriation bills. Notwithstanding that rule, we have a number of exceptions to it. In 1886 an amendment was offered in this House to an appropriation bill providing for the building of certain ships for the Navy. The Chairman held that resolution out of order as it was legislation on an appropriation bill, but the House overruled the ruling of the Chairman, and from that day to this good time it is in order to provide legislation on an appropriation bill for the building of the American Navy.

A few years ago we had a bill before this House to reduce the revenue on sugar coming from Cuba. The bill provided a reduced revenue on all articles coming from Cuba. An amendment was offered on the floor of this House to strike out the differential on sugar, and the Chair overruled the amendment and the House overruled the Chair and allowed the House to vote on the question whether we would reduce the differential on sugar in that bill. That is the question before this House, and the whole question. It is a question for the House to determine, notwithstanding the rule; it is for the House to say whether or not this is a proper question in this case.

I am sure that the present occupant of the chair desires to give a decision in this case as he sees it from the precedents, but it is for the House to say whether, under the importance of this case, we should establish a rule, as we have done many times and legitimately can do now in this case, and adopt this amendment.

Mr. MANN. In other words, that we shall govern not by rule, but by brute force.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Chairman, in former Houses the leading men on the side of the minority respected the rules. They respected them because at some time in the future they might have control of the House, and they did not want anarchy and confusion here. I do not know but that that day has passed, because the minority now, some of them, at least, would ride over the rules whenever they are in their way. They have no respect for the rules when they are brought up against some proposition of theirs, but are willing to take an amendment, which is confessedly upon a different subject, which confessedly is not germane, and say it is left to the Members of the House to determine for themselves, and to determine without respect to the rules.

Gentlemen on the other side are free with their advice to those they term the "kids" on this side of the House, in asking them to run wild and assert themselves, and all that sort of thing. I have occasionally seen people, denominated "kids," who did run wild for a while in the House of Representatives, and I never knew yet of its resulting in any honor or glory to themselves or benefit in the slightest degree. We have adopted these rules. We have pledged ourselves to maintain these rules. They are necessary for the protection of every man on the floor of this Chamber. It is better that no matter which is not germane, that no matter which is extraneous to the subject under discussion, be brought in under the guise of an amendment. It has been the experience of strong men, of able men, of wise men. The rules are the result of the experience of men in the past—James G. Blaine, James A. Garfield, Thomas B. Reed, and other men in the Republican party, and Samuel J. Randall, John G. Carlisle, and Charles S. Crisp, and the great men of the Democratic party—and this code of rules is the result of their wisdom. They have not only been wrought out in the experience of these gentlemen, but they have been hammered out in the daily conflict in the House for generations that are past, and it is of the highest importance, let me say, it is of the highest importance that we maintain the rules of the House upon this and upon every other question.

The Chairman has clearly demonstrated what is the rule in this case. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] refers to a ruling of the Chair made on the Cuban reciprocity bill where, when we were fixing the rate of duty on sugar and hides and all articles from Cuba, a foreign country, an amendment was brought in here taking off the differential—that is, the difference in duty between raw sugar and refined sugar—from all countries in the world. Clearly it appeared to the House that that was not germane, but I regret to say that the House overruled the decision of the Chair. Did any good come of it?

Two years later we had a reciprocity treaty, while if that bill had been passed it would have been better for the interests of the United States, passed as it was, than the treaty that came a little later. But that is no precedent for this House and it was not a precedent for that House, for within fifteen minutes a similar amendment relating to hides was offered to the bill, the amendment was ruled out by the Chair, and the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, by a large majority, voted that it was not germane, and sustained the action of the Chair. And that was sustained for two or three times during that memorable afternoon, showing that the sense of the House was that these amendments were not germane. But even if that amendment was put upon that bill, who is there with the hardihood to stand up in this House and say that to a bill amending a bill producing revenue for the Philippine Islands it is in order to go ahead and provide that at some day in the future the United States shall give them free government, or give them autonomy, make them independent, as does this amendment which is offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts? I trust each Member of this House will vote as his conscience dictates, will stand by the rules, and vote to sustain the Chair upon this proposition.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is, Shall the decision of the Chair stand as the decision of the committee?

The question was taken, and on a division (demanded by Mr. MCCALL) there were 198 ayes and 123 noes.

So it was decided that the decision of the Chair should stand as the decision of the committee.

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Chairman, I wish to offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

In line 13, page 3, after the word "duty," insert the following amendment: "Provided, however, That on all sugars in excess of 200,000 tons, wholly the growth and product of the Philippine Islands, coming into the United States from the Philippine Islands, each calendar year from and after the passage of this act, there shall be levied, collected, and paid the full rates of duty as now provided by law on all sugars coming into the United States from foreign countries, other than Cuba and territory belonging to the United States; and that the rates on tobacco shall apply as follows:

	Cigars.	Wrapper leaf.	Filler leaf.
Free of duty	50,000,000	300,000	3,000,000
At 25 per cent Dingley rates	100,000,000	400,000	4,000,000
At 50 per cent Dingley rates	150,000,000	No limit.	No limit.
At 75 per cent Dingley rates	200,000,000	No limit.	No limit.

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Chairman, I wish to say in support of this amendment that the friends of this bill have contended from the beginning that no very great amount of sugar can for a great number of years be produced in the Philippine Islands. The opponents of this measure have contended that the conditions of the soil and the quantity of the soil suitable for the raising of cane in the Philippine Islands will permit the people of that country to produce an unlimited amount, so that in time the sugar industry in this country will be crippled by great imports of sugar from the Philippine Islands. Now, I am going to take them at their word. In this amendment we are going to concede that no appreciable amount of sugar can be produced in the Philippine Islands beyond the amount that has already been produced there, and to bear me out in this statement I want to read from the hearings before the Committee on Ways and Means what Mr. De la Rama, a sugar producer in the Philippine Islands, said about the possibilities of the production of sugar in the islands. Mr. De la Rama said, in answer to a question put to him by Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH, of Michigan, a member of that committee:

Even if we should have no more trouble from the rinderpest, to produce the 200,000 tons which we produced formerly would take us at least fifteen years to replenish the cattle which we have lost. We never produced 400,000 tons, as Senator NEWLANDS yesterday stated. Our highest production was in the year 1893, when it was 300,000 tons, and our exportation in that year was 260,000 tons, 40,000 tons being used at home.

That will be found on page 181 of the hearings before the committee. Now, on page 183 Mr. De la Rama said:

But we will not produce more than 200,000 tons in fifteen years from now. I do not believe that 200,000 tons can injure any industry in the United States, especially fifteen years hence.

That statement comes from a man now owning a plantation in the Philippine Islands and producing sugar over there. Now, let me go further and show what Mr. De la Rama said:

My statement to the effect that we could not have a crop exceeding 200,000 tons fifteen years hence has also been questioned. I wish to state that when I say anything before the committee here I take facts as a basis, and not fantastic estimates. The facts are that before we suffered the rinderpest we did not produce an average of more than 200,000 tons; so that if we only produced 200,000 tons before we had the rinderpest, and before we suffered all the calamities that we had fall upon us, and now we produce 100,000 tons, I estimate that it will require fifteen years at least to replenish our stock of cattle and attain the same figure that we had before we suffered these calamities. And 100,000 tons is not a very small matter for us there, as we use all primitive implements.

I have already stated that Louisiana, with its modern machinery, has required ten years to increase its production of 100,000 tons.

Now, permit me to read what Governor Wright said. Governor Wright stated:

The statistics show that the production has gone from 300,000 tons to 100,000 tons.

Further along he said:

Now, if we give a reasonable stimulus to the sugar, so as to bring it up to a couple of hundred thousand tons in the next five years, that would greatly help, and possibly in the next fifteen or twenty years it might reach 400,000 tons.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Michigan asks unanimous consent to continue his remarks for five minutes more. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. FORDNEY. Now, gentlemen, we are willing to take you and your Filipino representatives who give testimony at your word, that no great amount can be produced, and if that is true we will let in free, absolutely free, of duty, 200,000 tons. But beyond that amount the sugar industry in the United States demands protection, and I beg of you to give it. Our President of the United States is celebrated for his saying to the people of this country that he proposes to give them a square deal; and the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means, the other day in his speech before this House, demanded a square deal. In all my life I never sat at a table in a game of cards where one man proposed to do all of the dealing and did not propose to pass it around. [Laughter.] All we ask, my friends, is an opportunity to deal once in a while. We ask you, in the name of all that is reasonable, gentlemen, to protect us against an unlimited amount of sugar coming in from those islands. I have it from a gentleman that sits upon the floor of this House now, an honorable gentleman, that only a few days ago Mr. E. F. Atkins, of Boston, a sugar producer in the Cuban islands, a stockholder in the great American Sugar Refining Company, who appeared before the Committee on Cuban Reciprocity, said to him:

Pass this bill and there will be no danger but that immediately American capital and American genius and American modern improved methods of production will immediately go to the islands and develop that industry.

That is what we have contended, my friends, would be the case. That is what we are afraid of. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. CASSEL], who asked me to add the clause referring to tobacco, will explain that portion of the amendment to you better than I can, except I wish to state that I have an abundance of protests from tobacco manufacturers and laboring men working in the production of cigars, protesting against this bill. I beg of you—I ask of you as a square deal to the American laboring man and to the American farmer—add this amendment, and I will vote for your bill. [Applause.]

Mr. PAYNE. I understand the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. CASSEL] desires to speak in favor of the amendment, and I yield for a few moments to him.

Mr. CASSEL. Mr. Chairman, I think it would be just as well to allow the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE] to answer both of our arguments at the same time. Those Members of Congress who have in their districts people growing, handling, and manufacturing tobacco, and who are opposed to this bill, have endeavored to prepare a schedule which will be satisfactory to the friends of the bill and which will effect a compromise in the measure.

We feel, as has been stated before, that the effect of this bill as it now stands will be very detrimental to the growers and handlers of tobacco and manufacturers of cigars. They therefore have prepared a schedule, first, giving free trade to the importation of 50,000,000 cigars, 300,000 pounds of wrapper leaf, and 3,000,000 pounds of filler tobacco. Personally, I am opposed to this free-trade clause; yet it has been agreed upon as a fair compromise in the matter. Second, at 25 per cent of the Dingley rate, the rate of this bill, 100,000,000 of cigars, 400,000 tons of wrapper, and 4,000,000 of filler; and at the 50 per cent rate—the rate upon which I think we should agree—150,000,000 cigars, with no limit as to the amount of wrapper and filler tobacco.

Let me say that the Philippines now produce about 150,000,000 of cigars, of which 70,000,000 are consumed at home and 80,000,000 are exported. The total imports from Cuba into the United States for the calendar year 1904 amounted to 59,360,546 cigars. Cuba's total exports were 215,013,451. By this amendment we are offering to the people of the Philippine Islands all they are contending for at the present time, and giving to our growers and manufacturers a fair and equitable protection, and I hope it will prevail.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Chairman, this proposition is not a new one. It was made to me some ten days ago by one of the opponents of this bill. I gave him my reasons why I was opposed to it. It was renewed last Saturday, and I was asked to poll the Committee on Ways and Means. Those I did see were nine, and those nine were opposed to the amendment. I am saying this because a local newspaper has published a contrary statement within a day or two, and the same paper, I think, also published a statement that the Secretary of War had proposed this and the opponents of the bill were considering it.

On the other hand, I am authorized to say that at no time has the Secretary of War favored this amendment, and would rather have no bill than to have this bill with this amendment. The gentleman argued on the sugar producers reaching 300,000 tons in fifteen years and reducing the amount here. So you do not need this amendment. But, Mr. Chairman, I have advocated this bill, not using the terms "square deal," not being so familiar with the use of those terms as the gentleman from Michigan seems to be, but our "plain duty," that came down to us from President McKinley, and give this as a duty we owe to the Philippine people. Now, I do not know what I should think of myself if I should catch myself thinking it was our plain duty to give this concession of tariff up to 300,000 tons and then put up 75 per cent of the Dingley rates on whatever came in beyond that. This whole thing is so impracticable. Suppose people in the future get anywhere near 300,000 tons. The next thing we would know there would be a grand race across the Pacific Ocean to get into our market free of duty the 300,000 tons, and the man who happened to be a little belated would have to pay 75 per cent of the Dingley rates. What more demoralizing thing could happen in such a scramble as that? Further, the very menace of it would prevent capital going into the Philippine Islands and prevent any development of the industry. You might just as well not pass any bill at all as pass a bill with this amendment. Now, as my deliberate judgment, after having thought of the thing ten days, and coming to me on Saturday, and again when it appeared in the press, I hope this amendment will be voted down.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I think that this amendment is offered for the purpose of enabling gentlemen who are supporting the bill to be entirely consistent in their arguments. As I understand it, there are two distinct and separate arguments used on this side in favor of this measure. One is that it is our duty to remove all tariff duties between the United States and our insular possessions. But in the same breath in which gentlemen make that statement on this side they insist and declare that they do not desire to harm any American industry. I think there is no gentleman on this side who is supporting the bill who would admit that he would vote for it if he were certain that it would injure an American industry. Now, in order that the gentlemen who are supporting the measure may be entirely consistent, in order that they may do their "plain duty" as they see it to the people of the Philippine Islands and at the same time do no harm to American industries, it has been proposed—what? That a very much larger, much greater amount of sugar, tobacco, and cigars than any of the gentlemen who are supporting the bill have been willing to admit would come into this country from the Philippine Islands for a decade shall be admitted under the terms of their measure, and that the remainder, which they say never will come—they say "can not come"—because it is impossible to so stimulate the industry of sugar growing and manufacture and tobacco raising and cigar making as to bring any considerable quantity here, and it is of such inferior quality that we would not have it if sent here, shall pay the regular rate of duty. Now, in order that these gentlemen may be consistent in their arguments, it is proposed that a much greater volume of these products may come in under the provisions of their bill than they have been willing at any time to admit would ever seek a market here, and I hope, therefore, as this opportunity is presented to the gentlemen on this side to be entirely consistent, to do their duty as they see it to the Filipinos, and at the same time defend our protective policy and American industries, that all gentlemen on this side will vote for the amendment.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Mr. Chairman, I desire to say simply one word in opposition to this amendment. It seems to me that it would strike at the very root of the principle upon which this bill ought to pass. We are offering to help the Filipinos to be prosperous. Shall we offer them prosperity with a string to it? I would as soon offer to set an unsuccessful man up in business and tell him that when he got to a certain degree of prosperity I would then withdraw my support. I would as soon take a little sick boy from a tenement house to some farm and say to him, "You can stay here until you get pretty well, but if you get very well I will take you back to the tenement house." I would as soon, on principle, vote for an amendment providing that when the number of school children in the Philippine Islands reached a million the teachers should be withdrawn and the schools closed as to vote for this amendment. I would far rather, from my point of view, see this bill fail entirely than see it pass with such an amendment as this.

Mr. HOGG. Mr. Chairman, it is very unfortunate indeed that I have not been able to be present during much of the discussion of this bill. I had expected, from what I might have heard if I had been here, to learn something about the Philippine Islands and our plain duty to them. I have listened, however, with a great deal of interest, so far as I have been able to be present, to the suggestions made by the proponents of this bill; and it has been at least some enlightenment to me to learn that this bill is not properly a bill originating in the House of Representatives, but one originating in one of the Departments of this Government, and that one of the reasons why we are called upon to support it is because, luckily for it, it has the commendation of a very powerful governmental officer.

I was a litle surprised that our honored leader [Mr. PAYNE] should refer to the tears that were in the voice of the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH]. After I had listened to the gentleman from New York a very short time I came to the conclusion that had there been tears in his voice for the Filipinos or for anyone else the flood of those tears would still be pouring down Pennsylvania avenue. [Laughter.] I am surprised, Mr. Chairman, to see the attitude taken by these gentlemen, so far as the interests of the American citizen are concerned. I grant them the right to feel a sympathy for the people of the Philippine Islands, but I deny them the right to feel that sympathy when, at the same time, they appear to fail to feel sympathy for the American citizen. [Applause.]

I know these gentlemen are kindly disposed toward the Filipino, because if those honored gentlemen who compose the committee that visited the Philippine Islands last summer had not felt kindly toward the people of those islands no doubt many of them would have remained at home; but I believe they were accorded the courtesy of the Secretary of War to accompany him to the islands in order that they might advise themselves as to the necessity and conditions of those islands. It was a very kind act on the part of the Secretary of War, and I have no doubt that it was very much appreciated by the committee that attended him upon that trip; but we learn from the report of Colonel Edwards that the expenses of that trip, in order that the American people might be informed as to the condition of those islands—expenses which were paid by the Filipinos, taken out of their funds—amounted to $10,000 in order to get this committee out there in order that they might feel a proper degree of sympathy for the Filipinos. It is just exactly the same amount of money that the Panama Canal Commission expended for their press agent, so that it seems now that it cost, in round numbers, about $10,000 to inform the American people that the administration of affairs on any particular subject is being faithfully and properly carried on. [Applause and laughter.]

I see one of their purposes is that they are to help the Filipino people, not only by the expenditures of vast sums of money in the islands for their benefit, but they are to help them by striking down the industries of these United States. I am quite sure, Mr. Chairman, that if these honorable gentlemen from the protected States of the East had had their industries menaced by any sort of industry in the Philippine Islands that we would not have had the tears here for the Filipinos that have been shed in their behalf. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. BONYNGE. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that my colleague may have five minutes more time.

Mr. PAYNE. I want to suggest that all debate on this amendment be closed in ten minutes, and that of that ten minutes the gentleman from Colorado have five. I ask unanimous consent for that.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent that all debate upon this amendment conclude in ten minutes, of which time the gentleman from Colorado shall have five. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. HOGG. I am very greatly under obligations to this committee that visited those islands, and not only we, but the gentlemen on the other side of the Chamber, ought to be under great obligations to them for the very large amount of information we have received, not only as to the condition of those islands, but absolutely as to the absence of necessity for the establishment of these tariffs at all. I am quite sure that our Democratic friends have not fully appreciated the efforts of these gentlemen.

All I have to say to them is this: So far as the future policy of the Republican party is concerned, so far as all these arguments are concerned in which you oppose the doctrine of protection, you are getting yourselves exactly into the condition of the man out in my district who lived in a mining camp. He had a broncho, which was the only broncho in camp. Everybody came to borrow it. He got tired of lending it and at last he taught the broncho to buck so that it would buck off the borrowers. But he taught it so well to buck that at last it bucked its owner. So you gentlemen are teaching us day by day here, in the arguments that you are advancing for the Filipinos, that it is utterly foolish and nonsensical for us to get up here and claim that protection to American industry means anything, because you say we will prosper without it. Now, if we can prosper without the imposition of this tariff in the Philippines why can we not prosper without the imposition of tariff against other portions of the world? [Applause.]

You gentlemen of this committee went over there to see the Filipinos, and I have the account of Colonel Edwards, who seems to have attended the committee. I am surprised that you secured so much information as you did. If you will take the accounts of that trip given by Colonel Edwards you will find that the committee visited a certain place. There was a parade, a banquet, and a dance. [Laughter.] Then they left that place and went to another place and there was a parade, a banquet, and a dance. [Laughter.] If you will take the hearings of the gentlemen from the Philippine Islands who addressed you, you will find that one of them told you the trouble that they had was that it took about all that they could rake and scrape together to give you that dinner. That statement is in the hearings. [Laughter.]

It was about all they could do to raise money enough to give you your dinner, and still you took it to help the poor Filipino. [Laughter.] I can see these reverend señors and señoritas dancing in the mazy dance in order to learn something about the Filipino. Why, I want to say to you, Mr. Chairman, that while I believe we ought to do our plain duty to these people, I believe more in the patriotism and intelligence of the American citizen than I do of any person who wears a breech clout and lives under a bamboo tree. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I was amused at the account given by the gentleman from Colorado of the trip out to the islands last summer. It is true these people are very hospitable people; it is true they insisted on a banquetta every time we arrived in town. It is true the ingenuity of the whole party was devoted to the task of getting rid of the banquetta and getting it out of the way of the hearings, but we succeeded well enough to get pretty full hearings everywhere we went over the islands.

These gentlemen speak about the people there being dressed—I do not know whether he called it a string around them, but a great majority of these people we saw there were dressed with pants, vest, and a coat and hat. Some of them had a plug hat, and some of them have $6 worth of Prince Albert clothes.

I want to say to the gentleman and for the peace of mind of gentlemen on this side of the House that seem to be so worried lest some doctrine in the principle of protection is going to be interfered with by this bill, I think some of them have been alarmed for fear words that I said may be quoted or had been quoted on the other side of the House as to the efficiency of this sugar labor over there in the Philippine Islands.

I did say, and I say now, that a dollar's worth of that labor is not any more efficient than a dollar's worth of labor in Michigan or Illinois. Why? They are different from the other oriental people just now; they have been making progress under the American flag and American occupation. They used to pay 6 cents a day for labor on the sugar plantations, and now they pay 30 cents in gold. They have increased the wage five times and they have not increased the efficiency. So the relation of labor has come to adjust itself with our high-priced labor here on the mainland.

I have no fear, Mr. Chairman, but that wherever our jurisdiction goes, in the language of Mr. De la Rama, prosperity will go with it. Higher prices will go with it, higher prices for labor, higher prices for food, higher prices for clothing, and everything will cost more, and yet the general propserity will be greater, as it always has been in the United States over every country on the face of God's earth. We are going to maintain the protective tariff so far as the people outside of the United States are concerned. But the Republican party has never stood, and does not stand now, and will not in the future stand, for any protection between one part of the country and another, between one part of our possessions and the remainder of our possessions, because it is not right, it is not just, it is not honorable so to do. [Applause.]

Mr. SULZER. Why don't you take off all the tariff between the United States and the Philippines?

Mr. PAYNE. I wish my friend from New York had got here before so that he would know more about it.

Mr. McMORRAN. Mr. Chairman, I desire to announce the position that I take upon this amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The time for debate on this amendment is closed.

Mr. McMORRAN. I ask unanimous consent, then, Mr. Chairman, that I have five minutes.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, I wish the gentleman would defer his remarks until we come to another amendment, unless he wants to speak directly on this amendment. The House has voted to close debate by unanimous consent.

Mr. McMORRAN. This is one of the most important amendments that will be offered here to-day.

Mr. PAYNE. Well, if the gentleman wants to speak on this amendment, I do not object, but I ask that debate close at the end of his speech.

Mr. McMORRAN. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, I was in hopes that the leaders of this House would permit this amendment to pass in view of the statements that have been made in regard to the sugar interest and the sugar to be imported from the Philippines. They have already claimed that the amount to be imported from the Philippine Islands would do us no harm; they have claimed that the passage of this bill would be of great benefit to the Filipinos. What are the practical results? To-day you are passing a bill that reduces the revenue to the Filipino at least two-thirds of what he is now receiving. Instead of receiving $500,000, the present revenue, it will receive less than $170,000 under the bill before the House. What benefit is that to the Filipino? Now, there is another reason why you should permit this amendment which is verified by the remarks of Mr. BOUTELL, of Illinois, yesterday, when he stated as follows:

> There will be a slightly increased importation of sugar into this country, but I should doubt whether for many years to come it would ever go beyond the 200,000 tons limit. So that it seems to me, Mr. Chairman, that those who are interested in the sugar industry need have no fear of the effect of this measure upon their industry.

Now, gentlemen, if you have no fear of this amount coming here, why do you object to this amendment? It is very evident that there is an iron rule holding over the leaders of this House which says to them pass this bill or none at all.

I have listened and I have watched for sentiment in favor of this bill throughout this country, but I have never yet seen any sentiment except right here—west end of Pennsylvania avenue. It is just as impracticable a bill as the Cuban reciprocity bill which passed two years ago, and I assume there is no gentleman here who is proud of his vote in favor of Cuban reciprocity at that time. It was a blow aimed at destruction of the sugar industry of this country. What are the facts? You have taken away from this Government six millions of revenue. You have given to the Cubans barely three millions. You have not reduced the price of sugar to the consumer here yet one fraction. Who has been benefited by it? Nobody but the American sugar trust. Ah, our President has proclaimed these trusts should be regulated, and yet he comes here and advocates the passage of a bill which adds to the strength of these trusts and places in their hands, instead of $6,000,000, $9,000,000 a year to help them defy the legislation of this country. Now, gentlemen, I ask and pray of you to vote for this amendment of Mr. FORDNEY'S. It is a fair one. It should receive due consideration, and I want to say to you further that every man who casts his vote for the passage of this bill as it stands is placing before the capital of this country a menace to all further investment where investment comes in contact with the tariffs of this country. Can you afford to do it? Your Republican party has pledged itself to protect every American industry, and especially the sugar industry. You are passing an act here that is confiscatory of the amount of money that has been invested in the sugar industry of this country to a certain extent. Are you willing to go before the country and say you favor that kind of legislation? I say not; I say, gentlemen, give this matter careful consideration and cast your vote for this amendment and you will never make any mistake. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. Butler] asks that the amendment be again reported. Without objection, it will be so reported.

The amendment was again reported.

Mr. BUTLER of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I rise to make a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania will state it.

Mr. BUTLER of Pennsylvania. The amendment seems to include two distinct and different subjects. Is it in order to move to divide this amendment so we may vote separately?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state that it appears upon investigation that the earlier portion of this amendment relates to sugar, and then, beginning with the word "and," it relates to tobacco. The Chair is of opinion there are two substantive propositions embodied in the amendment and that a division may be demanded.

Mr. BUTLER of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, since making the inquiry I understand that that motion would lead to confusion, and therefore I have no desire to make the motion to separate.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the adoption of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Michigan.

The question was taken; and the Chair announced that the noes appeared to have it.

Mr. FORDNEY. Division, Mr. Chairman.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 66, noes 126.

Mr. FORDNEY. Tellers, Mr. Chairman.

Tellers were refused, 19 gentlemen having arisen in support thereof; not a sufficient number.

Mr. PUJO. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend line 4, page 2, by striking out the word "and," after the word "sugar," and inserting the words "and rice" after "tobacco."

Mr. PUJO. Mr. Chairman, the object of this amendment is to place rice in the same category as sugar and tobacco—that is, rice imported from the Philippine Archipelago into the United States.

Mr. PAYNE. If the gentleman will allow me, Mr. Chairman, the only industry that has found any fault with this bill, except sugar and tobacco, has been the rice industry, and members of that industry have come to me and said they would be satisfied with this amendment.

They are afraid of it. They are afraid that foreign rice will be introduced into the Philippine Islands by speculators and then domestic rice sold in the United States. I do not think their contention amounts to much, but I have not any objection myself to putting this into the bill and allowing them the 25 per cent rate during the three years. So I have no opposition to make to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. PUJO].

Mr. PARKER. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment to the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. PARKER] offers an amendment to the amendment. The Chair will state that the gentleman from Louisiana has not yielded the floor.

Mr. PUJO. I have yielded the floor to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS].

Mr. WILLIAMS. For an interruption.

Mr. PUJO. For an interruption.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Now, if rice is put on the bill in the same category with sugar and tobacco, will the gentleman representing that industry then vote for the bill?

Mr. PUJO. Why, I think, to characterize the question in as parliamentary language as I can, that it is an extremely inconsiderate one. However, if it is asked in good faith, I——

Mr. WILLIAMS. If we are to gain strength for the bill by that infinitestimal concession, it would have a large effect, to my mind.

Mr. PUJO. I suppose that is meant entirely in an ironic sense. But I desire to state that my position all the way through has been that rice is one of the revenue-producing articles of this country, and that I am opposed to the substitute by the members of the minority because they desire to put a revenue-producing article upon the free-trade list. Now, if that be true, if you are determined to do that, I ask that you place rice in the bill and recognize it as a revenue-producing article, the same as sugar and tobacco. Then that leaves me in this position: I am opposed to the substitute, but I think I am in favor of the bill. I announced the other day, and still believe, that we are entitled to absolute free trade between the Philippine Islands and the United States, they being a part of this territory; but, in addition to that, we ought to have the laws applying to the United States encircle the Philippine Archipelago. In other words, I believe the Philippine Archipelago ought to be held to be a part of this country. Then the dominant party advocating this favorable legislation would find out what they have brought into our political family, and they would be glad to get rid of the Philippine Archipelago, a policy which I would favor. But the policy outlined by some of the Democratic members of the minority of the Ways and Means Committee, suggesting that we join in legislation which will result beneficially to the Philippines, will never get rid of those islands, and therefore we will be burdened with this incubus during all of our political existence. Mr. Chairman, I hope that this amendment will be adopted. I believe it is fair and right. I believe under the legislation contemplated by this bill without this amendment speculators in the Philippine Archipelago could buy all the rice they desire from India, and ship to the United States the rice produced in the Philippines without the payment of a duty and destroy our home industry. I hope, therefore, that the amendment will receive the favorable consideration of this House.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, a message from the Senate, by Mr. PARKINSON, its reading clerk, announced that the Senate had agreed to the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 2558) authorizing the Washington Bridge Company to construct a bridge across the Columbia River near the city of Wenatchee, Wash.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed the bill (S. 321) to provide for the extension of time within which homestead settlers may establish their residence upon certain lands which were heretofore a part of the Uinta Indian Reservation, within the counties of Uinta and Wasatch, in the State of Utah.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed without amendment joint resolution of the following title:

Joint resolution (H. J. Res. 68) relating to the contingent expenses of the House of Representatives.

PHILIPPINE TARIFF.

The committee resumed its session.

Mr. POU rose.

The CHAIRMAN. For what purpose does the gentleman from North Carolina rise?

Mr. POU. To offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. A separate amendment?

Mr. POU. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. PARKER] offers an amendment to this amendment.

Mr. PARKER. Mr. Chairman, I offer it as a substitute. Mr. Chairman, I can state it in an instant. The purpose of the gentleman's amendment is to add rice to the 25 per cent list; the purpose of my amendment is to add everything to the 25 per cent list except hemp, which is already on the free list, so that everything from the Philippines will pay 25 per cent except hemp.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from New Jersey.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend section 1 as follows: Strike out all after the word "islands," in line 3, page 2, to and including the words "duty aforesaid," in line 5, page 2, and insert in lieu thereof the words "except hemp which hereafter shall continue to be admitted free of duty, shall be liable to pay only 25 per cent of the rates of duty aforesaid."

The CHAIRMAN. If the gentleman from New Jersey please, it does not seem to the Chair to be exactly an amendment to the amendment, but is in the nature of a substitute.

Mr. PARKER. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Before the substitute is in order, the original amendment offered by the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. PUJO] must be voted upon, that being in the nature of an amendment to perfect the paragraph.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri will please state it.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. The gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. POU] had some sort of an amendment. I did not understand whether it was an amendment to the amendment of the gentleman from Louisiana or not. It does not——

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understood it to be an independent amendment.

The question was on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Louisiana.

The question was taken; and the Chair announced that the noes seem to have it.

Mr. PUJO. Division, Mr. Speaker!

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 64, noes 50; so the amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks the amendment offered by the gentleman from New Jersey is now in order. The Chair will ask that it be reported.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend section 1 as follows: Strike out all after the word "islands" in line 3, page 2, to and including the words "duty aforesaid" in line 5, page 2, and insert in lieu thereof the words "except hemp, which hereafter shall continue to be admitted free of duty, shall be liable to pay only 25 per cent of the rates of duty aforesaid."

Mr. PARKER. Mr. Chairman, I desire to say but a word to the House. This amendment is perfectly clear. It puts all articles, products of the Philippine Islands—except hemp, which is already upon the free list—upon a rate of 25 per cent of the Dingley tariff.

The object is in the first place to protect, by a partial tariff, articles of our own growth and production, and in the second place to give the Philippines a preference in our markets to the extent of 75 per cent; in the third place, to see that they keep their revenue received from those duties, which is all returned to them and which they need.

I would state that if this amendment be carried, or indeed if it be not carried, I shall offer a subsequent amendment by which all manufactures of iron and steel, manufactures of cotton, and manufactures of petroleum and its products, all machinery—argicultural, industrial, or locomotive—wholly the product of the United States, going from the United States to the Philippine Islands, or until 1909 from Spain to the Philippine Islands, shall likewise be put upon a preferential tariff of 25 per cent of their duties, my object being to bind the two countries together by preferential arrangements between the two. We do not fear the rivalry of Spain on any of those articles.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Chairman, I trust that that amendment will be voted down, and I ask for a vote.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. PARKER].

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Mr. Chairman, I offer the amendment which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The amendment was read, as follows:

Nothing herein contained shall be held to mean that the United States intends to incorporate the inhabitants of the Philippine Islands into citizenship of the United States, nor is it intended to retain permanently said islands as an integral part of the United States; but it is the intention of the United States to establish on said islands a government suitable to the wants and conditions of the inhabitants thereof to prepare them for independence, and thereafter to collect on the products of the Philippine Islands the same custom dues collected on the products of other foreign countries when imported into the United States.

Mr. PAYNE. I make the point of order that that amendment is not germane.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman for Texas desire to be heard on the point of order?

Mr. SLAYDEN. Mr. Chairman, to be perfectly frank, I do not care so much to be heard on the point of order, but I should like to have the privilege of five minutes' time to speak on the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. If there be no objection, the gentleman from Texas desires five minutes to speak upon his amendment.

Mr. PAYNE. I will reserve the point of order for five minuntes, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas will proceed.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Mr. Chairman, I am sincerely grateful to the gentleman for his generosity.

I have been so absorbed in the contemplation of the political features of this bill, and I so utterly abhor the political relationship existing between our country and the Philippine Islands, that I have given very little consideration to its economic side, which I consider as of little consequence and as of small importance compared with the political side of the question.

Gentlemen on the other side of the House who are greatly disturbed about the dangers which threaten their industries had an opportunity a while ago to support a measure which ultimately, if it became the policy of this country, would have relieved them of all danger, and they now have an opportunity to support this amendment, which proposes after a certain period of probation to put the Philippine Islands upon the same status exactly as other foreign countries in the matter of the collection of customs dues.

I listened with a great deal of interest to the debate on this bill, and everything which was said for the bill, and against the bill, for that matter, tended to confirm my conviction that the Philippine Islands were utterly unfit for political association with the Republic of the United States. I, sir, am sorry to say that I can not concur with the minority of the House and of the Committee on Ways and Means in supporting a proposition for absolute free trade between the Philippines and the United States. I believe that the country will contend, and I believe that it will reasonably contend, that when we vote to place the Philippine Islands upon the same customs plane as that now enjoyed by Massachusetts, by Texas, and by California it will be accepted as approval of existing conditions. It will be taken to mean that we have accepted as a finality the annexation of the Philippine Islands; that the curtain has been rung down, and for weal or woe the Filipinos are Americans and Americans "for keeps."

Gentlemen, you can not get my consent to do that which will even squint in that direction. Furthermore, Mr. Chairman, I have some objection to the bill from an industrial standpoint, although I consider it of small economic importance. I have one great objection to it as a tariff bill. When tariff bills here make a reduction they invariably smite a southern industry. The tobacco, sugar, and rice of the South—if any industries of this country are to be hurt by this legislation—are those which will be most seriously stricken. But, Mr. Chairman, it is of vastly more importance in my humble judgment to sever these political ties than to levy any sort of tariff between the Philippine Islands and the United States, whether it be high, moderate, or none at all. I will cheerfully vote for the minority bill if there can be incorporated in it such an amendment as that which was voted for by the Senate, declaring substantially the same idea as the amendment which I now offer, and which passed the Senate by a Republican vote. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York makes the point of order that the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas is not germane. The pending bill relates entirely to the tariff upon articles coming from the Philippine Islands into the United States or going from the United States to the Philippine Islands, while the amendment relates to the permanent retention of those islands by the United States, and provides also for the establishment of a certain form of government on the islands, matters entirely different from those contained in the bill. The Chair thinks the amendment is not germane and sustains the point of order.

The gentleman from New Jersey offered another amendment, which has not yet been read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend section 1 as follows: On page 3 strike out from and including the words "wholly the growth," in line 5, to and including the words "free of duty," in line 13, and insert in lieu thereof the words "iron and steel and their manufactures, cotton and its manufactures, petroleum, schists and bitumen and their derivatives, and instruments, machinery, and apparatus employed in agriculture, industry, and locomotion, all being wholly the growth and product of the United States or wholly the growth and product of Spain, shall be subject to pay only 25 per cent of the duties collected on merchandise imported into the Philippine Islands; but this reduction of duty shall cease as to the products of Spain on the 9th day of April, 1909.

Mr. PAYNE. If I understand the amendment, it raises the duty. I do not think the gentleman from New Jersey wants to do that, but whether that is the gentleman's purpose or not, I hope the amendment will not prevail.

Mr. PARKER. Mr. Chairman, it is not 25 per cent of the Dingley tariff, but of the Philippine tariff. The amendment will give to American products exported to the islands—steel, petroleum, cotton goods, etc.—a preference from now on of 75 per cent reduction from the Philippine tariff, so as to give America a preference, as well as Spain, until 1909, over other nations in bringing those articles into these islands. Spain does not produce them and we do.

Mr. PAYNE. Does the amendment also include Spain?

Mr. PARKER. Yes.

Mr. PAYNE. Then I make the point of order, Mr. Chairman, that it is not germane.

Mr. PARKER. But you have provided, in spite of the treaty, that tobacco shall go free from America.

Mr. PAYNE. We make no provision in regard to anything as to Spain.

Mr. PARKER. You provide that tobacco shall go free, and if you give this to American tobacco you have to give it to Spanish tobacco.

Mr. PAYNE. I make the point of order that it is not germane.

Mr. PARKER. Mr. Chairman, I will strike out the reference as to Spain.

Mr. PAYNE. And further than that, Mr. Chairman, I did not know where the gentleman's amendment came in, but it seems that it is an amendment to an amendment that the House has already adopted this morning, and of course it is not in order.

Mr. PARKER. It does more than to strike out that amendment, Mr. Chairman. I ask for a vote.

Mr. PAYNE. This amends, or seeks to amend, the amendment in line 4, page 3, and I make the point of order that it is not in order.

Mr. PARKER. The gentleman offered an amendment which the committee agreed to, and I move to strike that out with other words down as far as line 13. I can strike out what the gentleman put in with something else.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will hear the gentleman.

Mr. PARKER. What is the point of order?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York makes the point of order that inasmuch as the amendment refers to Spain it is not germane.

Mr. PARKER. The Chair will notice that the language already in the bill refers to the 11th day of April, 1909, which was the day when Spanish goods have no longer an equal right with American goods. Up to that time we have to give, according to his construction of the treaty, to Spanish goods an equal right with American goods. Perhaps this would follow as a matter of law. But, Mr. Chairman, I do not care for that; all that refers to Spain can be stricken out of my amendment if it strikes the Chair as being of any importance.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understands the gentleman from New Jersey to strike out of his amendment that part relating to Spain. Without objection, that will be done.

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. But the gentleman from New York also makes the point of order that the amendment proposed amends an amendment which the committee this morning has already adopted.

Mr. PARKER. It not only does that, Mr. Chairman, but it does more. The gentleman from New York put in the words which the committee has adopted in lines between 3 and 8. This comes in conjunction with words in print between lines 8 and 13. I strike out both of them, in order to have a substitute for both. That is entirely in order, because it deals with a subject controlled by all that language taken together. I did not desire to interrupt the gentleman this morning.

Mr. PAYNE. Will the Chair have the amendment as finally modified read by the Clerk?

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the Clerk will again report the amendment.

The Clerk read the amendment as modified.

Mr. PAYNE. I insist upon the point of order, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair finds that the amendment proposed is to strike out the words, beginning in line 5, page 3, "wholly the growth and product of the United States shall be admitted to the Philippine Islands from the United States free of duty." These words form a part of the amendment to which the committee has already agreed. While the question is not entirely free from doubt, the Chair is of the opinion that the amendment proposing to strike out what the committee has once voted in is not in order.

Mr. PARKER. I suggest, Mr. Chairman, that I strike out not only that, but something with it, with which it was in conjunction. I strike out not only that amendment, but something else, so as to make the substitute for the whole and not for the words that were put in. It would be in order to move to strike out the whole section.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair, upon a hasty inspection, finds its ruling apparently sustained by a ruling referred to in the Manual, that words once inserted may not be changed or stricken out, but words relating to it may be added to other portions of the paragraph. This amendment proposes to strike out words already adopted, and the Chair thinks it is out of order.

Mr. PAYNE. I understand the gentleman has finally modified his amendment again.

Mr. PARKER. No, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. No; the Chair has ruled the amendment out of order for another reason.

Mr. POU. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend by adding to end of section 1: "And provided further, That whenever the President of the United States shall ascertain to his satisfaction that any article manufactured in the United States and enumerated in the act of July 24, 1897, being chapter 11, Acts of the Fifty-fifth Congress, first session, and acts amendatory thereto, is sold in any foreign country at a price less than the same article is sold within the United States, the President, in such event, is hereby authorized and empowered to order a reduction of the import duty now collected upon similar articles brought into the United States from abroad, equal, as nearly as possible, to the difference in price ascertained by the President to exist between the aforesaid article sold abroad and the same article sold within the United States."

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that this is not germane.

Mr. POU. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will withhold that point of order about five minutes he may save some time.

Mr. PAYNE. Well, Mr. Chairman, I will withhold the point of order for five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York withholds his point of order and the gentleman from North Carolina is recognized.

Mr. POU. I am not surprised, Mr. Chairman, that the point of order was made against this amendment. I introduced this amendment as a last resort. This is my third term in Congress, and for four long years I have been trying to get a bill incorporating the provisions of this amendment before the House. I have introduced such a bill twice and it has never yet been able to run the gauntlet of the committee which had charge of it, and so as a last resort, hoping that the Chair would adopt the view that this amendment was germane to the bill, I have framed it and introduced it. It is a matter of common knowledge, Mr. Chairman, that the manufacturers of this country have grown to be so great and powerful that they are sending their goods across the water and selling them to foreigners cheaper than they do to us. They are punishing us for making them great and powerful. My amendment takes away this power to punish by allowing a Republican President to order a reduction in the import duty exactly equal to the difference in price. Now, I do not see how any mortal man who is in favor of justice and right between man and man can oppose the reduction of the import duty upon those articles to that point which would force the trusts to sell goods as cheap to us as they do to foreigners. [Applause.] Now, gentlemen, the last one of you is pledged to do something to relieve the consumers of this country from the burdens of the trusts, combines, and monopolies. If you want to pass a law that is worth something, vote for this amendment, if the Chairman will only give you the chance, and the people of the country will say we have been true to our pledges, true to the trust they have placed in our hands; but somehow or other it always happens, Mr. Chairman, that whenever any bill is introduced here which helps the consumer and wealth producer there is always some little rule in the way of it and it seems impossible to get it before the House.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I believe I could show, if I had the time, that this amendment is germane. I believe if you would give me time and listen to me I can show it is not out of order, but from the former ruling of the Chair in respect to another amendment I confess I have but little hope, and therefore I conclude by saying I have introduced this as a last resort in the hope that the Chair, having at heart the interest of the millions of people who are under the domination of the trusts and combines, will allow this amendment to come before this House. If I occupied your position, so help me God, I would put this amendment before this House if every other chairman of every other Committee of the Whole and every Speaker of every Congress had from time immemorial ruled to the contrary. Your rules are a curse when they come between us and our duty to the people. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would not feel like violating the rules even to serve the most worthy purpose. The bill before the House is confined in its provisions strictly to the tariff relations between the Philippines and the United States. The amendment offered by the gentleman from North Carolina relates to the tariff laws generally between the United States and all countries. It introduces a very different and much broader proposition. The Chair thinks it necessary to refer to but one ruling in the Fifty-eighth Congress, where an amendment limiting immigration generally was held not to be germane to a proposition to prevent the immigration of Chinese alone. Here is a bill relating to the Philippines and an amendment relating to the tariff generally. The ruling to which the Chair refers was made by the present Attorney-General of the United States. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] offers an amendment, which the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out, on page 2, the language beginning with the word "except," on line 3, down to and including the word "aforesaid," on line 6.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Chairman, my object in offering that amendment need not long be dwelt upon for the information of either side of the Chamber. If the amendment goes through, it provides our friends the enemy, the majority on the other side of this Chamber, with a consistent bill, a bill consistent with itself. If it be right to grant to the Filipinos free trade after 1909, it is right to give it to them now. If it be right to give it to them in everything except sugar and tobacco, it is right to give it to them on sugar and tobacco.

The majority bill is a hodgepodge of conflicting principles and conflicting ideas. It runs along Democratic ideas except as to sugar and tobacco, and except as to three years of time upon those two articles. It runs along the line of Republican ideas with regard to the three years of time, so far as the three years apply to those two particular articles. Seeing a lucid interval in the Administration and a lucid interval upon the part of what seems to be a majority of its followers upon this floor, leaving out of consideration for the moment the insurrectos, who but a moment ago had an opportunity to scale the wall and rid themselves of the Philippine Islands and did not have the courage to take advantage of it, but were backed out by the technical opposition of a mere rule which is a slave and servant of the House, and not its master—noticing, I say, a lucid interval on the part of the Administration and the majority of the party following the Administration upon the floor, I thought perhaps it might be well to offer this amendment in order to let full light in upon their intellects, so that they might know what real, sound, good, old American doctrine was, beginning back with the assertion of our colonial ancestors that the British Parliament had no right to make taxation discriminations against British subjects in America, and running on down until now.

If the amendment is adopted the balance of the majority bill will be unhurt. I will not touch another line or figure in it. All I want to do is to strike out this language:

Except sugar and tobacco, manufactured and unmanufactured, upon which there shall be levied, collected, and paid only 25 per cent of the rates of duty aforesaid.

Surely the gentleman from New York, the majority leader on this floor and the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means, will not object to the minority offering an amendment striking out less than three lines of this bill.

Then the amendment gives our friends the recalcitrants, the insurrectos, the blanket Indians, whatever they may be, an opportunity to assert themselves. They have already said that the 25 per cent in the bill will not protect the sugar industry from "destruction." They have already said that the 25 per cent in here would not protect the tobacco interests from "destruction," and already my friend from Louisiana [Mr. PUJO] has doomed rice to "destruction" by putting it on equality with tobacco and sugar.

Now, a man destroyed can not be destroyed any further. A thing killed can not be killed any worse; and if the 25 per cent of duty retained in the majority bill has already killed, destroyed, or ruined the great American sugar industry and the great American tobacco industry, then, by taking the prop of even that 25 per cent out from under the corpse, you only allow the corpse to be buried just a little bit quicker and not hurt its feelings at all, because it is dead already and has no perceptible feelings to hurt at all. I sincerely hope the chairman of the committee will accept the amendment and that there will be no further discussion upon it. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. PAYNE. I wish to express my thanks to the gentleman from Mississippi for his kindly efforts in behalf of the majority, but I think we will try to struggle along without his aid in the perfecting of this bill.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman a question. It is a very pertinent one. It is if you think you can struggle along and pass this bill without our votes? [Laughter on the Democratic side.]

Mr. PAYNE. I will say to the gentleman from Missouri that is very impertinent. [Laughter.] We need these revenues to aid the government of those islands. And I want to say right here in regard to the taxes imposed under our administration and the taxes imposed under Spain, the Spanish tax in 1896 was as follows: Urbana, 120,000 pesos. This is a tax on dock and wharf facilities, etc., in cities. Then the industrial tax, 1,275 pesos. A cedula tax, 7,952,000 pesos, The cedula tax is a poll tax, and under the Spanish régime it rated all the way from 5 to 35 pesos, and of course it operated very heavily upon the poor. Then there was raised by profits on lotteries 1,151,000 pesos. Of course all this came from the poor people. Then, from opium and other monopolies, 1,368,000 pesos. On forestry products, 142,000 pesos, making in all 12,033,422.24. From customs, they received 5,040,000 pesos, and from municipal taxes, 1,000,000 pesos, making in all 18,073,422.24. The silver peso was equal to 60 cents Mexican, I think, in 1896, making a difference of 20 per cent between the Mexican peso, or the Spanish peso, and the United States peso, which is a full 50 cents, and you have a total raised of 21,688,164. The local tax of 1,000,000 pesos and 20 per cent upon that, making 1,200,000, should be deducted, and you have a total tax of 20,488,164. Now, the tax collected by the United States in 1895 was land tax, and used locally, 2,000,000; then internal revenue, 5,000,000 pesos, of which 25 per cent was locally used, 5,000,000; customs, 13,328,862, making a total of 20,328,862 pesos, and from that you deduct land tax used locally, 2,000,000 pesos, and deduct 25 per cent internal revenue used locally, 1,250,000, together 3,250,000, and you have 17,078,862 pesos.

Of course we have wiped out the lottery business altogether and cut down the industrial tax. Our cedula tax was 1 peso on each male from 18 to 60 years of age.

Now, Mr. Chairman, criticism has been made here that we have increased the salary list, and we have. I think the gentleman from Rhode Island [Mr. GRANGER] had a copy of the list of the salaries paid to the Commissioners. We have fixed our salaries, and we did it on the theory that the highest use of an official was to do his duty, and not on the theory that formerly prevailed there that a salary was a mere incident; so we adopted this policy when we took charge of the government, and the wisdom of that was seen in the first year after we took charge of the Philippine Islands. Under precisely the same customs duties, precisely the same law, in the year after we took possession of the Philippine Islands we collected 14,000,000 pesos against 5,000,000 pesos collected by Spain in the previous year. That was during the first year we had control of the islands. So that we have, from increasing the salaries, paid for an honest administration, instead of adopting their theory of paying the customs duty and paying their other taxes under the law according to the sweet will of an official, and we have collected this much more money. Then we have also increased the expenditures for permanent improvement. In 1904 for permanent improvements the amount paid was $3,350,413; for emergency, $628,086. Part of it was for the St. Louis exposition, and it seems that the Philippine Islands have indulged in some of the same kind of foolishness that the Congress of the United States does with respect to these things. Then we spent for education $1,000,000 more than Spain paid. For the improvement of Manila Harbor since our occupation we have expended $4,000,000, and for Iloilo large sums, and we have expended for the Benguet road $2,000,000. We have also expended $1,000,000 for coast-guard boats, and for laboratory and public buildings, schoolhouses, light-houses, and for health, $240,000 annually.

During the rebellion in the islands it seemed absolutely necessary to have this means of transportation to carry the constabulary swiftly from one point to another. Now the Commission expect to sell these boats and turn the whole business over to private parties. Then for a laboratory, public buildings, schoolhouses, and light-houses we have expended very large sums of money; for the public health $240,000 annually. Now, here comes the proposition from my generous friend from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] to cut down this revenue about a million and a half of dollars. If it is cut I suppose they will have to live within the cut. They have already reduced salaries. They have been at it for more than a year. They might cut down the educational facilities, and yet I do not believe my friend from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] would want them to do that. They need $2,000,000 more annually for education. They will have to make the cut in some necessary expense, and something that ought to be done would not be done if we extended this free trade at once. Hence the wisdom of this provision that we keep up this duty in order to get this revenue.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I did not understand what it was that the gentleman charged that even a Democrat from Mississippi would agree to. What was it?

Mr. PAYNE. I said he would agree that the expenditures for education ought not to be cut down.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Well, I think we will agree to that, but we might——

Mr. PAYNE. I thought the gentleman would agree with a little more cheerful alacrity.

Mr. WILLIAMS. But we might contend that the money for the expenditures for education ought to be levied upon the wealth of the islands rather than upon their consumption. Let the taxes be levied upon personal property——

Mr. PAYNE. Of course, the gentleman is always "harping on my daughter."

Mr. WILLIAMS. Yes; let the taxes be levied upon personal property and upon land. Let the people who can afford to pay the taxes pay them. Why do you want to collect all the money for the education of the Filipinos by taking the clothes off their poor backs and by depriving their poor stomachs of something they need? [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. PAYNE. The gentleman used my time and I will have to ask for a little more.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Chairman, in consideration of the fact that the gentleman provoked me to inflict myself longer upon the House, I wish to apologize to him by asking that he have the privilege of ten minutes more.

Mr. PAYNE. Oh, I do not want more than five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. For the reason stated, the gentleman from Mississippi asks unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman from New York be extended for five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. PAYNE. The gentleman seems to imagine that the time has come for the Democratic party now to fool the people upon the subject of tariff and taxation, and gentlemen on that side are trimming their sails, as you will notice, and getting ready for the canvas. Why, our good old genial friend from Missouri the other day [Mr. CLARK], not 75 years old, but yet old enough not to back on his record, did not want to admit that he had ever spoken in favor of tearing down the custom-houses and having absolute free trade, and he tried to get himself around onto a tariff-for-revenue basis with incidental protection in it. He did not succeed very gracefully. He is not used to that sort of thing, and if he would take my advice, I would advise him to stick to his old-fashioned text of free trade, because he is more grotesque when he appears in that rôle than in any other. And then my friend from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] seems to caution people on that side of the House every time against making declarations in favor of free trade. The idea now is a tariff for revenue only, and then they try to tickle and fool the American people with the idea that if we have a tariff for revenue, having to raise so much money, it must be protective. And yet, Mr. Chairman, England raises a large revenue from a tariff, and everybody knows it is not a protective tariff and that it does not protect a single industry in Great Britain. Taking into account our double population and our largely more than double consumption in this country, it would be very easy even for the gentleman from Mississippi to frame a tariff bill that would be a tariff bill for revenue in this country without an ounce of protection in it from one end of the bill to the other. Yet the American people are told this on the threshold of the campaign, and our friends are sounding the keynote—a tariff for revenue with incidental protection. I do not believe they will fool the people this time with any such false cry as that.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, my colleague [Mr. PAYNE] has urged that the tariff rate of 25 per cent of the Dingley bill be kept upon tobacco and cigars because the revenue that would be derived from those articles is needed in the Philippine Islands. In a speech reporting this bill to the House he stated that the only reason why immediate free trade should not exist between the islands and this country was the need of this revenue. During that speech he also stated that the reduction from 75 per cent of the Dingley rates to 25 per cent would have no appreciable effect on the export of sugar and tobacco in this country.

During the past year there was exported from the Philippine Islands to this country tobacco to the value of $6,820. According to the statement of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BOUTELL] yesterday, there would be practically no revenue whatever derived from the tax of 25 per cent of the Dingley rates upon tobacco. During the last fiscal year there was exported from the Philippine Islands into the United States 127,563,880 pounds of sugar. If an equal amount of sugar be exported into the United States during this coming year, the amount of revenue derived by the Philippine Islands at 25 per cent of the Dingley rates will be $537,364.

This is the revenue that the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE] contends is necessary for the Philippine Islands for proper maintenance of their government. It amounts to 3 per cent of the entire revenues of the Philippine Islands. The entire revenues of the islands last year were $17,585,371, and this insignificant sum amounts to only 3 per cent of the total revenues of those islands.

Mr. PAYNE. Does the gentleman take into account the production of sugar?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I take the gentleman's statement and the statement of his colleagues on the committee that the passage of this bill will result in no appreciable increase in the export of sugar from the Philippine Islands to the United States.

Mr. PAYNE. We imported 39,000 tons last year from the Philippine Islands.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I have given the figures which I have taken from the Bureau of Insular Affairs.

Mr. PAYNE. The customs duties on that are over $800,000.

Mr. FITZGERALD. But 25 per cent of the Dingley rate——

Mr. PAYNE. Would be about $300,000.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Then that is only 1½ per cent of the total revenue, and I have been too generous.

Mr. Chairman, it cost the Filipino treasury to make an exhibit at the World's Fair at St. Louis $771,600, more than $400,000 more than would be raised from the imposition of this duty on tobacco and sugar, taking the figures of the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE]. It cost to take the census of the Philippine Islands—the entire cost is not given, because they had not completed the census when the figures were compiled—$636,931, double the amount of the revenue that would be derived from retaining 25 per cent of the duty on cigars and tobacco, according to the figures of my colleague. Neither of these two items would be included in the charges against the revenue of the Philippine Islands during the coming year.

There is another expense, the amount of which can not be told because there is no official report upon it, but the Philippine government has been charged with the expense of conducting a tour, headed by my colleague, through the Philippine Islands during the past year. How much it cost we can not tell, but if public rumor is correct, if reports can be believed, the cost will be less the gross sum contributed by the members of the party to that expense at the rate of a dollar a day. Mr. Chairman, that would be another expense that will not be charged against this revenue in the coming year.

Mr. GROSVENOR rose.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from New York yield to the gentleman from Ohio?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Certainly.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I hope the gentleman from New York will state the facts, and not draw on his imagination.

Mr. FITZGERALD. If I have made any misstatement I shall be delighted to be corrected.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I want to correct the gentleman in regard to the members of the Taft party paying a dollar a day. I do not want to go into a detailed statement, but the gentleman is misled.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I saw it stated and understood it to be the fact that the members of the so-called Taft party were requested or required to contribute to their keep while traveling on United States transports, and I believe the rate on those palatial steamers is a dollar a day. If I am in error there are gentlemen here who were members of that party and they can correct me.

Mr. GROSVENOR. On the tour through the islands, which amounted to about 2,300 miles, each member of the party paid $1.50 a day for subsistence, and that more than paid the entire expense to the Government; the quartermaster reported that he had a surplus on hand at the end.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I think the gentleman was taken advantage of if they charged him a dollar and a half a day. But, Mr. Chairman, whatever the expense was, it will not for the coming year be a charge against the revenues of the Philippine Islands. I am not criticising the gentlemen of the House nor the officials of the Government for taking the trip, but I think they should give the Filipinos their money's worth. They should remove this tariff completely. At this time I wish, Mr. Chairman, to welcome my colleague and his associates upon the Committee on Ways and Means to the Democratic position upon the tariff question between the Philippine Islands and the United States. In 1902 this side stood consistently for free trade between the Philippine Islands and the United States. The gentleman and his associates advocated and passed a bill retaining 75 per cent of the Dingley tariff rates upon exports from the Philippine Islands. To-day this side stands consistently in favor of free trade between the Philippines and the United States, and the gentleman and his associates have almost taken our position, but defer coming our way completely until 1909.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I ask, Mr. Chairman, that the gentleman's time be extended two minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Mississippi asks unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman from New York be extended two minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The gentleman and his colleagues defer the complete removal of the Dingley tariff rate until April 11, 1909, when the treaty with Spain expires. I have been somewhat in doubt whether that was the real motive of the Committee on Ways and Means for fixing the time when these duties should be removed or whether it was because, not being possessed of heroic natures, it was impossible for them to admit at once their error and come over openly to this side as the only proper, consistent, and justifiable position upon the tariff question between the Philippine Islands and the United States. We ask you now, before it is too late, not to defer your complete conversion, but to come over at once and support the amendment of the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS]. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, I think, in view of what has been said here about the expenditures of the civil government in the Philippine Archipelago, it may be well to make reply to the question propounded by the gentleman from Maine [Mr. LITTLEFIELD] the other day, during the general debate, as to how much, if any, effort is being made to reduce those expenditures. Answer was made to the gentleman from Maine that the Commission had effected a reduction aggregating $100,000 in gold per annum. Thereupon the gentleman from Maine inquired what percentage that sum was of the gross expenditure, and no reply could then be given him. I find that the answer of $100,000 was incorrect. On inquiry at the Insular Bureau, I was informed by Colonel Edwards, who is in charge, that the appropriations for the insular government have been reduced for the fiscal year which will end on the 30th of June next, twelve hundred thousand pesos, which is equivalent to $600,000 in gold. In addition to this saving, there has been a reduction for the expenditures of the municipality of Manila of ₱600,000, equivalent to $300,000 gold. So that the aggregate reduction in expenditures for the general government of the islands and for the municipal government of Manila will aggregate $900,000 gold.

Mr. WATSON. For how long a time?

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. For one year. That means approximately a 5 per cent reduction over the gross expenditures of the previous fiscal year. They also have plans which they expect to put into effect that will reduce the aggregate expenditures for the fiscal year to end June 30, 1907, by $2,000,000 in gold. This will make a reduction of approximately 12 per cent over the expenditures for the fiscal year ending June, 1906.

Mr. PAYNE. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Yes, sir.

Mr. PAYNE. Is it not also the wish and desire and judgment of the Commission that the expenditures for education should be increased by the sum of at least $2,000,000 annually, as soon as they can do it?

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Yes, sir.

Mr. PAYNE. And also, is it not a fact that the duty collected from rice imported into the islands last year amounts to $1,300,000 and that the estimate is it will not be over half as much this year, or $650,000?

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Yes, sir.

Mr. PADGETT. How much of the reduction that you mention was for a reduction of salaries?

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Part of it was for a reduction in salaries, but there are some salaries to be reduced or abolished during the next fiscal year which could not, in justice, be reduced during the present fiscal year.

Mr. PADGETT. But of the $600,000 which you mention for the current fiscal year——

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I can not itemize that.

Mr. PADGETT (continuing). Can you give any estimate of how much of it is for reduction of salaries?

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. No, sir. You can get that from the Insular Bureau. But there is a very considerable reduction because they are reducing the number of officials in the provinces and elsewhere and putting more territory under their respective jurisdictions than heretofore.

Mr. PADGETT. Was there any reduction in the amount of salaries paid?

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. As I said, that could not well be brought about during the present fiscal year, because men have gone there to take places with the understanding, implied at least, that they are not to be disturbed for a certain time—one year, possibly, I presume. After that, I am informed, there will be a considerable reduction in the aggregate of salaries.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Wisconsin has expired.

Mr. KEIFER. I will yield to the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE] for a moment.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Chairman, I ask that all debate on this amendment be closed by unanimous consent in five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE] asks unanimous consent that debate upon this amendment be closed in five minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I do not know of anybody on this side who wishes to debate it any further.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. KEIFER. Mr. Chairman, I do not rise to interfere with the present pleasant controversy between the two leaders of the two great parties, because they are soon to be united lovingly in voting for this bill. I wish to say, however, a word about tariff revision. I do not understand that substituting free trade for existing duties is revision, but it is so called by the distinguished leader on the other side. This is what I wish to say on that subject.

Revising the tariff would not affect beneficially any person in this country, or anybody at all, unless a reduction of duty was so great as to permit the introduction into this country of foreign manufactured goods. To the extent that foreign goods would be introduced here our own manufactured goods would be limited, and our own skilled and unskilled laborers would be thrown out of employment. If this result did not follow, then revision would do no harm, or good, and would be a foolish waste of time. Free trade, or any approach to it that does not secure pauper manufactured foreign goods and the displacement of a like amount of our own manufactured goods, does not affect anything.

If an industry has reached a point in production that it can sell at home or abroad in competition with the same industry of all countries, then a reduction of import duties would simply produce no results. It would bring no revenue, and such revision would be deceptive, and time would be misspent in doing it.

It follows that any revision that does not destroy or injure some home industry by inviting cheaper foreign manufactured goods to be brought here to take the place of our own, or to take the place of what is called "raw material," such as hides, wool, and so forth, would not stop our own home production, and would likewise produce no results, not even revenue. So revision of duties on what we now produce would only have the effect by reduction to seriously injure our own industries.

If the duty is reduced only so as to threaten the coming in of foreign products and so as to require the reduction of the price of our own home products, then the laborers and farmers will suffer the penalty in reduced wages and in the value of home products.

The Member from Massachusetts [Mr. KELIHER] yesterday made some sort of a defense of Mr. Douglas in the matter of his selling shoes, of which I spoke a few days since. He has Mr. Douglas say the duty on hides adds 7 cents to the cost of a pair of shoes instead of 2¼ cents, as I stated. A later investigation, made carefully, proves my statement was right. But the point I made the other day is hardly changed if his figure is correct. By it he is shown to add 43 cents in making the price on his $3.50 shoes over and above the admitted added cost of the leather in a pair of shoes on account of the 15 cents duty on hides. But I neglected to say the other day that when hides were on the free list, under the Wilson-Gorman Act of 1894, he sold the same, or a poorer quality of his shoes, for exactly $3.50 per pair to people who were much less able to pay for them without any duty to stimulate him in doing so. [Applause.]

He is in a like situation to the great Sir Francis Bacon, who, when he was charged, as lord chancellor of England, with taking £2,000 for rendering a decree, bitterly denied the charge, and said he only took £500. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, I wish to make a request in connection with the remarks that I have just made. I have just received from Mr. George W. Russell, a distinguished man in Lynn, Mass., some remarks from the standpoint of a laborer that I would like to have the unanimous consent of the committee to print in connection with the remarks I have already made.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. KEIFER. To look at the question of defense and free trade from the view point of a wage-earner and from our latest experience in tariff revision, it seems incredible that so many of our people are determined to try a downward revision of our tariff at the close of the most prosperous year for all of our people that we have ever enjoyed or that the world ever saw before.

The manufacturers in the Middle West and the farmers in the West and Northwest are anxious about the new German tariff. Germany is fixing a tariff for her own people and not to please the United States. We had better lose the whole of our export trade rather than to fix our tariff so as to increase our imports of competing goods. We have imported in the last three years, 1903, 1904, and 1905, manufactured cotton goods valued at $50,303,303 each year. This annual import is more than the annual product of Fall River and Lowell combined, or more than 200,000 people almost wholly employed in the production of cotton goods. Would it not have been better for the farmers and manufacturers and other producers and working people in this country to have had these imported cotton goods produced in this country, where the more than 200,000 people would have bought all of the things that they would have consumed of American producers, instead of in Europe, where the producers bought all the things that they wanted to consume of European producers?

Apply the same principle to all of our imports which we could have produced ourselves, and we shall have created a home market for our products far greater than we can ever get by fixing our tariff so that the imports of competing goods will be increased. It is our home industries which will increase our home market that we need to promote, increase, and enlarge, and not foreign industries. Every consumer in this country buys from two to ten times as much in a year as any like number of people in the world.

A consumer who earns from 5 to 20 cents per day is not of much value to his own country's market or to any other country's market. It is certainly for the interest of our farmers, manufacturers, and working people to create wealthy consumers here at home by producing all that we want to consume in our own country. If we could realize the value of an American consumer and the great American market, we should not hear so much that is not true about the value of the foreign market. Free traders say a good deal about our surplus products, when the truth is that our surplus is almost wholly caused by imports of foreign products.

Let us look at conditions existing immediately before our last experience in revising our tariff. In 1892, under the McKinley law, our foreign trade was $1,857,680,610. In 1895, under the Wilson tariff, our foreign trade had declined to $1,539,508,130. Under the Dingley tariff our foreign trade has increased to $2,635,507,500 in 1905, and for the twelve months ending October 31, 1905, it was $2,725,000,000. Figures just supplied by the Department of Commerce and Labor show that for the calendar year 1905 our exports of manufactures will amount to $570,000,000.

Production for our home market is the sole cause of our prosperity. Any foreign trade that tends to decrease our home production and our home market is detrimental to our prosperity and the well-being of our people. Our home market is all the market that we control, and under free trade we can not control our home market. July 17, 1892, after the McKinley tariff had been in operation twenty-three months, the New York Herald (Democratic free trade) said:

The business of the country is in a healthy and flourishing condition. The exports and imports are greater than those of any former year. Railroad earnings for the first six months of the year are greater than those for any similar period in the history of the country, and the output of manufactures has been greater than ever before. Business failures for the first half of the present year have been 1,000 less in number and $40,000,000 less in liabilities than they were in a corresponding period last year.

New industrial enterprises for manufacturing iron and cotton and woolen fabrics are going into operation in various sections. While the margin of profits is small, business is on a solid foundation and the outlook is hopeful and encouraging in every direction. The grain crop is promising, money is abundant, and collections are easy.

The late Edward Atkinson, possibly the most able free-trade writer in this country, in an article in the May Forum, 1892, said:

There has never been a period in the history of this or any other country when the general rate of wages was as high as it is now or when the price of products relatively to the wages as low as they are to-day, nor a period when the workingman, in the strict sense of the word, has so fully secured to his own use and enjoyment such a steadily and progressively increasing proportion of a constantly increasing product.

No higher praise of a protective tariff could be given by the most ardent protectionist than the above from two eminent free-trade authorities.

Bradstreet's, at the close of 1892, said:

There have been 356 new mills built during the year just closed. The production of cotton goods is the heaviest for any year on record. Notwithstanding the large decrease in prices, the dividends increased by reason of the largely increased home production and consumption. The increase in the production of woolen goods for the year is estimated at 15 per cent. The increase in the output of the boot and shoe factories compares favorably with that of the textiles. Wages in the cotton mills throughout New England have been advanced.

So much for the prosperous conditions under the McKinley tariff. In 1892 the Democrats started the cry against the McKinley tariff just as they are doing now against the Dingley tariff, and enough free-trade Republicans (just as they are doing now) joined them to elect Cleveland, with a Democratic House and Senate, and the prosperous conditions changed quickly and absolutely, just as they will now if the Dingley tariff is revised downward. In August, 1893, after President Cleveland had been in office hardly six months and the threat of freer trade had been hanging over the industries of the country scarcely a year, President Cleveland said:

With plenteous crops, with abundant promise of remunerative production and manufacture, with unusual invitation to safe investment, and with satisfactory assurance to business enterprise, suddenly financial distrust and fear have sprung up on every side. Numerous moneyed institutions have suspended because abundant assets were not immediately available to meet the demands of frightened depositors. Surviving corporations and individuals are content to keep in hand the money that they are usually anxious to loan, and those engaged in legitimate business are surprised to find that securities which they offer for loans, though heretofore satisfactory, are no longer accepted. Values supposed to be fixed are fast becoming conjectural, and loss and failure have involved every branch of business.

It would be hard to find any more positive evidence of the blighting effects of the threat of freer trade than this testimony of Mr. Cleveland's, with both branches of Congress in accord with his free-trade views, to make the threat a fact. The New York Journal of Commerce of November 14, 1895, said:

With both bankers and merchants of foreign countries the American stands discredited and has to settle his accounts with a promptness scarcely ever before experienced.

Dun's Review of February 22, 1896, said:

Prices of commodities as a whole are at the lowest average ever known. Breadstuffs have declined 25 per cent since February, 1893; meats, 28 per cent; dairy and garden products, 45 per cent; while sugar, coffee, tea, and liquors only 8 per cent.

In clothes and products of leather the decline has averaged 12 per cent, and metals, coal, and oil, 18 per cent. In the four years, 1893 to 1897, domestic animals—horses, mules, cattle, sheep, and swine—decreased in value from $2,403,506,681 to $1,819,146,306. In 1892 our per capita consumption of wheat was 5.97 bushels; of corn, 30.33 bushels; of cotton, 24.03 pounds. In 1894 our per capita consumption of wheat was 3.41 bushels, a loss to the farmers' market of 42 per cent; of corn, 22.76 bushels, a loss to the farmers' market of 25 per cent; of cotton, 15.91 pounds, a loss to the farmers' market of 33 per cent.

It must be remembered that the Wilson tariff (which caused so great a loss not only to our agricultural, but also to all other producers in this country) was a mild free-trade law and not at all satisfactory to the more radical free traders. Mr. Cleveland characterized the Wilson law as a measure of perfidy and dishonor. Will it not be more to the interests of our farmers and manufacturers and other producers to see to it that our home market is adequately defended, rather than to worry about foreign tariffs? We produce and consume one-third of the world's products. We exaggerate the importance of the foreign market, but when we examine the figures, which tell the absolute truth, we find that we import as much as we export. We find also that our imports are largely competing manufactured products, while our exports are largely raw, bulky products which it would be far better for us to convert into manufactured products before they are exported.

One thing is certain, and our freer-trade advocates will find it out, if the Dingley duties are lowered in the least additional competing products will come in, wages will be lowered, and the consumption of American products will be less. The imports of competing products under the Dingley tariff show this to be absolutely true. "For twenty-five years the principal claim of the Republican party to popular support has been its devotion to the protective policy. If it were now, by a reduction of the Dingley duties by a Republican Congress, to forfeit the confidence of workingmen and others who have for these twenty-five years voted for its candidates, it would merit defeat at the first opportunity that would be presented to an indignant people. We believe the party will be true to its record."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the adoption of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS].

The question was taken; and the Chairman announced that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Division, Mr. Chairman.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 68, noes 170.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Insert after the word "shall," in line 2, page 4, the following, "until the 11th day of April, 1909."

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, the bill provides that all the tariff collected on goods coming from the Philippine Islands to this country shall be paid over to the Philippine government, but this expires by limitation on the 11th of April, 1909. The bill also provides that goods coming from the Philippine Islands to this country shall pay in addition to the tariff the internal-revenue tax of this country, and that this shall be paid over to the Philippine government. The amendment which I have offered proposes to limit that to April 11, 1909, so that when the conditions existing between this country and the Philippine Islands shall be revised, as they inevitably must be at the end of the period named, and we have to make a new deal with the Philippine Islands, we will not be charged by the Filipinos with taking something away from them that belongs to them. We all know that the moment a privilege is given to any class of people, either here or in the Philippines, they consider it a vested right, as proven on the floor of this House now in the discussion of this bill as relating to the tariff on tobacco and sugar. As soon as we by law give to somebody or some class a special benefit, they assume it as a matter of right; and if we put into the law, without limitation, a provision that we shall pay to the Philippine government a part of our internal-revenue taxes it never will be changed, in my opinion. A howl will go up, there will be a furor on the part of the Filipinos, that we are taking away from them something which we had once given to them. If we put a limitation of time in we simply put ourselves in a position where in enacting some future legislation the Committee on Ways and Means can use their own free judgment without any cry against them on account of ingratitude. I hope the chairman of the committee will agree to this amendment, which can do no possible harm and which will prevent trouble in future legislation.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the adoption of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend by inserting in line 6, page 2, after the word "aforesaid," the following: "Except on Philippine sugar there shall, after the approval of this bill by the President of the United States, be levied, collected, and paid in lieu of the duties now provided by law on all sugar above No. 16 Dutch standard and on all sugar which has gone through a process of refining, imported into the United States 1 cent and eight hundred and twenty-five one-thousandths of 1 cent per pound."

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that the amendment is not germane.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I wish you would reserve it.

Mr. PAYNE. I will reserve it for five minutes in the interest of my friend.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, I have no desire whatever at this stage of the proceedings to inflict a speech upon this House, but I want to explain this amendment very briefly. The total differential on refined sugars imported into this country amounts to $5.30 a ton. This amendment cuts off $2.50 of that differential and leaves $2.80. If I had followed my own inclination I would have offered an amendment to cut it all off; but yielding to the judgment of some of my friends I have offered the amendment which takes off $2.50 of that differential.

They say, and therefore I say, expressing their opinion, that taking half of it off no possible injury can be done to the producer of raw sugar in the United States, and still gives the American market to the American manufacturer. But it does reduce the price of refined sugar to the American consumer, and, so that you can not have any doubt about it, I will tell how. Last year we imported and consumed 2,967,160 tons. The reduction that this amendment gives would amount to $6,917,905 a year—that is, it cuts off that much annually of the enormous and unjust profits of the sugar trust and gives it to the 83,000,000 American consumers of refined sugar.

Now, gentlemen, not only on the Democratic side, but the Republican side—and I would not say anything to hurt your feelings, because I like you all—time and time again on that side of the House and in Republican stump speeches and in Republican editorials we have heard the American sugar trust denounced in the severest terms that a man can pronounce in the English language. Now, you have an opportunity of proving your faith by your works, and if you vote against this amendment, forever and eternally hereafter hold your peace about the extortion of the sugar trust.

Now, one word more. For the seven hundredth time, I think, the gentleman from New York, chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means, has referred to a speech I made here in the spring of 1897. I want him to get that right, for what I said was classic [laughter], borrowed bodily from Sir Walter Scott's "Marmion." That was that I would destroy every custom-house in the United States "from turret to foundation stone." Now, I will tell you what I have to say about that. One of my predecessors in this House, along back in the sixties, was a man of splendid genious—Col. George W. Anderson. He had boxed the political compass completely before he died. He had belonged to every political party that was organized in his time, except the Prohibitionist. [Laughter.] He was born a Democrat in Tennessee. He became a Whig, a Know-Nothing, and a Republican; served four years in this House as a Republican, and then, returning to the Democrats, was made a judge by appointment of a Democratic governor, and died finally in the odor of Democratic sanctity. While he was running for Congress the second time he was opposed by a very able man, Col. F. Switzler, the Nestor of the editorial profession in Missouri. In the debate Colonel Switzler took an entire hour to prove that Anderson was inconsistent. When Anderson's time came, the only reply that he ever made to the charge of inconsistency was: "Fellow-citizens, consistency be damned!" [Laughter.] If I were not a church member I would repeat those words here to-day [laughter]; but being a church member, and being afraid of getting turned out of the church for swearing, I will put it this way: I had rather be inconsistent and be right than to be consistent and be wrong. [Applause.]

If the Republicans want it, I will prepare an illuminated edition of that speech that I made in the debate here in 1897 and present every one of them with a copy of it to frame and hang on his wall. [Laughter.]

Mr. PAYNE. I renew the point of order, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Now, Mr. Chairman, on the point of order——

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will hear the gentleman from Missouri on the point of order.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I want to say this: I am afraid, to use a very common western expression, that "the horse's eye is sot." [Laughter.] But I want to say this (of course the Chairman understands that that is just a figure of speech, for I hold him personally in high esteem): On the Cuban reciprocity bill, I think it was, Mr. Morris of Minnesota offered this same amendment, word for word. The Chairman of the committee on that occasion [Mr. SHERMAN], a splendid presiding officer, ruled that it was not germane. Mr. Morris or somebody on that side—I think it was Mr. TAWNEY—appealed from the decision of the Chair. By a very large majority the House of Representatives, largely Republican in its character, overruled the Chair and established the precedent by a very large vote that this differential amendment is germane. I believe it is germane. The chief feature of this bill is sugar. We have all talked sugar for twelve days. It has been sugar, sugar all the time, and this amendment deals with sugar. Mr. Chairman, I take it, with all due respect to the present occupant of the chair, or any other man that ever occupied the chair or ever will occupy it, that the House of Representatives is greater than any chairman of it ever was or ever can be. That was the deliberate verdict of this House, and, as I said here the other day, it was a splendid spectacle, one of the finest that I have ever seen, when enough Republicans marched down that aisle and joined with us to march between the tellers and overthrow the Republican machine in this House. The Republican insurrectos on that occasion emancipated themselves from the shackles which bound them for one brief, fleeting, halcyon moment. They must have felt more like men, more like Americans, when the sun set that day than they ever felt on any other day of their lives.

Now, Mr. Chairman, that is the highest precedent, the most binding one, it seems to me, that can be found in the parliamentary history of this House, and on that I rest this case. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Mississippi desire to speak on the point of order?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will hear the gentleman.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Chairman, the rule of a parliamentary body is a creature of the body which makes it, and is never the master of the body which makes it. For that reason, in all parliamentary bodies in all free-governing countries, the construction of a rule is referred to the body itself by an appeal from the decision of the Speaker or the temporary chairman.

The question of "germaneness" is lost in a fog of precedents, with some few bright spots in the fog. All sorts of temporary chairmen of all sorts of parties on all sorts of questions have made all sorts of rulings. Luckily, every parliamentary body, this one among others, has reserved to itself the right of passing upon the decisions of its chairmen or speakers, putting itself in the attitude of a supreme court upon parliamentary questions, from whose decision there is no appeal.

Mr. Chairman, in the Fifty-seventh Congress this identical question came up—on all fours with it precisely. A gentleman sitting in the place that you now occupy ruled that a motion to cut off the differential on sugar was not germane to the consideration of any provision of a bill granting reciprocity to Cuba.

The House took the question from the Chairman—the House, whose creature not only the rule is, but whose creature the Chairman is—the House that no Chairman had a right to overrule—and the House in its wisdom seeking substantive legislation in behalf of the freedom of American people from the oppression of the sugar trust, ruled that the motion was germane to the pending legislation.

Mr. Chairman, you have no right, whatever your own private opinion may be, sitting in the place you now occupy, to undertake to overrule the House of Representatives passing in deliberate judgment upon the question of germaneness or a question of parliamentary law of any other character. A Chairman sitting where you do is generally ruled by the precedents of another Chairman, even of coordinate authority with himself, with no higher dignity and no higher authority. But a Chairman has exercised that right even very seldom, because it has been thought best when a precedent was fixed to follow it, even if the precedent was not thought by the then temporary Chairman to be altogether wise.

Mr. Chairman, in general debate on the other side of this Chamber, and here, too, but especially there, within the last few days, we have heard the changes rung again and again upon this proposition—that, with this bill passed, "it would result only in bringing into competition with the American sugar—the farmers' product—the cheap labor of the Philippine Islands, while it would not reduce to the American consumer one particle the price of sugar in the United States." And when men asked "Why?" they answered by saying, "Because the sugar trust, owing to the sugar differential, would get every dollar of the difference between the cheapened raw sugar and the sustained refined sugar price, and put it in their pockets. Now, then, were you sincere when you said that? Did you mean it when you said it, or were you merely talking for the galleries and home consumption? If you were not merely talking for the galleries and home consumption, if you were not lacking in intellectual integrity, if you are innocent of a charge of disingenuousness preferred against you, now and here is your chance.

There was once a time when men hesitated to take the step, because the rule, as it had been construed by some, stood athwart their pathway, but this House, the supreme court upon the subject of rules, in its wisdom set the wrong construction of that rule aside, and declared that the resolution to remove a differential upon a reciprocity bill was germane to the bill. Much more is it germane to a bill which reduces duties between one part of America and another part of America.

Mr. Chairman, what are gentlemen going to do? You gentlemen who were talking so loudly lately; you gentlemen who have been complaining of gag law; you gentlemen who have been complaining of the whip and spur——

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will ask the gentleman from Mississippi if he is speaking to the point of order.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I am appealing to the gentlemen on the other side to sustain the decision of the House upon the question of germaneness by pointing out the question before the House; and appealing to them to do that, I am quoting their own record, their own utterance, and showing that there is a substantive justice for the proposition, as well as good parliamentary law. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Now, gentlemen, what are you going to do? Go home and tell the people, when they ask you why you did not vote to take the clutches of the trust off their throats, "Yes; we could have given somebody else besides the trust the benefit of this. Yes; the trust is getting it all, must be getting it all, because I said to myself a few days before, but when faced with the question I backed down, because"—what? Because there was no parliamentary status? No; you can not fight behind that pretext any longer, because the Supreme Court upon the question of parliamentry law in this House—this House itself—has passed upon that, and you can not go back to the circuit court and inferior court, some Chairman or Speaker, and justify yourselves.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I am not making that argument to men who possess all the acumen in regard to parliamentary questions that you have. This temporary Chairman will have no appeal of that sort necessary to be made to him, because he knows—nobody knows better than he—that it is the duty of the Chairman to follow the precedent by the House—his superior.

I never expect to see the day when the gentleman now in the chair will conclude that he has the right to overrule the solemn, deliberate, wise judgment of the House, whose servant he is, with regard to the question of germaneness on a motion before this body. I have but one argument to make—the precedent, the authority, and the arguments that were behind that side of the proposition the day that the House in its wisdom adopted and spread upon the record—the Journal of this House—its construction in favor of the germaneness of this amendment. Mr. Chairman, here is the chance for everybody that has not been a demagogue upon the sugar-trust question to kill the sugar trust in so far as the sugar differential may give it life.

The Chairman is going to rule that the resolution is germane, and after he rules the resolution is germane I trust every one of you will walk up with us on this side and show that you have not hitherto been uttering mere loud-mouthed fulminations to the empty atmosphere, or if he rule otherwise, you will, on appeal, reverse him, in order that you may demonstrate the same fact to the country. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Chairman, the gentlemen upon that side have made what they call an argument upon this question of the germaneness of this amendment, but neither of them have dared to argue the question itself now before the Chairman of the committee. It is so obviously not germane to the bill now before the committee that these gentlemen, specious as they sometimes are, adept sometimes of seeming to make the worst appear the better reason, abandon all attempt to argue that this would not break the rules of the House and refer to a precedent made in reference to the Cuban reciprocity bill, as they claim. I remember the circumstances, Mr. Chairman, attending that so-called precedent. We had been discussing the bill for several days. We approached a final vote. The night before there was a Democratic caucus held in reference to the bill, in reference to one peculiar phase of it, because there were men on that side of the House who up to that time had opinions of their own and reasoned out matters and who were familiar with the rules of the House and who knew that the amendment offered was not germane to the Cuban reciprocity bill. They met in caucus and a majority of the caucus decided that they would vote to overrule the decision of the Chair and declare that amendment was germane, and then they added to the resolution, "and this shall be binding upon every Member of the Democratic party." That is the way the precedent came to be established in this House that they are claiming to-day. They came in the House——

Mr. WILLIAMS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PAYNE. When I get through——

Mr. WILLIAMS. I want to ask the gentleman a question immediately pertinent to what he was saying.

Mr. PAYNE. Go ahead.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Was not that a House with a very large Republican majority?

Mr. PAYNE. Not a large Republican majority.

Mr. WILLIAMS. How, then, could a Democratic caucus have controlled that House?

Mr. PAYNE. Now, Mr. Chairman, they came into the House. There were gentlemen upon this side of the House who were opposed to the legislation. They had been caucusing together for weeks. It does not seem to have entered into their brains up to the time of this Democratic caucus that they could run over the rules of the House; that they could, as the gentleman from Mississippi said when he misspoke himself and spoke his real sentiments, override the rules of the House. They had not gotten to that pass, and the fight seemed to be over when this caucus was held, but on the spur of the moment when the decision had been made by the gentleman from New York [Mr. SHERMAN] that the amendment was not germane and was not in order, thirty-one of those gentlemen, possibly thirty-five, were stampeded into voting that this amendment was germane and passed between the tellers following the lead of the gentleman from Tennessee, Mr. Richardson, who then was acting as leader upon that side of the House. That there were some of those gentlemen upon that side of the House who conscientiously believed the amendment was not germane was known to every Member of the House. That there were more of them than of the gentlemen upon this side who passed between the tellers in favor of overruling the Chairman was also well known, but their voice was stifled in the face of the caucus. They followed out the behest of the caucus, and I believe with a single exception they voted to overrule the decision of the Chair. Now, there was an argument made by one gentleman upon this side of the House. The Cuban bill dealt with the duty upon sugar and all articles coming from a foreign country—from the island of Cuba. It was an amendment, so far as that was concerned, to the Dingley tariff law. It provided that in view of certain reciprocal arrangements all articles coming from Cuba should come at 80 per cent of the Dingley duty. The amendment offered referred, as does the amendment to-day, to the differential rate charged upon refined sugar and took that off not only for Cuba, but for other foreign nations. Gentlemen argued upon this side of the House that the bill itself interfered with the equilibrium of the duties upon sugar, with the equilibrium of the tariff law, with the equilibrium of customs duty upon goods coming from foreign countries; that we were disturbing the equilibrium and having disturbed the equilibrium the House might give it another jar by declaring that the amendment was germane. That was the argument that was made. The decision of the Chair was overruled. In less than fifteen minutes another amendment was offered by a gentleman from Massachusetts, putting hides on the free list; an amendment just as germane as the other. Gentlemen upon that side of the aisle were right when they said it was just as germane as the amendment offered to the sugar schedule. The Chairman of the Committee of the Whole—temporary Chairman, as the gentleman from Mississippi says—why, the Chairman has this power upon this amendment, that if in this committee it is declared to be germane, when we go to the House we can not raise the point of order and have the Speaker of the House pass upon that question, because the amendment is reported to the House if adopted and he can not declare it out of order.

And so this temporary Chairman had all the powers of the Speaker of the House in making his decisions here, so far as this committee is concerned and so far as the House is concerned if he makes a mistake and the amendment comes into the House to be voted upon. I say this amendment was offered. The Chairman of the committee said that, notwithstanding the vote of the House, he was there to enforce the rules of the House, and the rules of the House very plainly declared that that amendment was out of order. And so he properly ruled that this second amendment was not in order, and the gentleman proposing it took an appeal to the committee, and, behold, there was a different result. The committee, by more than double the previous majority, declared that the Chairman was right, that the amendment was not germane, and they brushed it aside—hastily, it is true—they brushed it aside, because they were anxious to do it and get out of the dilemma they had put themselves in. They promptly reversed themselves and marched between the tellers, declaring that the rule should prevail in that the amendment was not germane.

We have an amendment which is different from that proposed to the Cuban sugar schedule. Then the bill dealt with foreign government and foreign territory. Then the revenue went into the Treasury of the United States. Then it was an amendment of the Dingley bill. We have a different proposition before the committee to-day. It is not a bill that interferes at all with the revenues upon goods coming from foreign countries. It is a distinct and different matter.

Why, Mr. Chairman, you recollect when the Supreme Court came to pass upon these questions they held that the Dingley bill imposed a tariff upon goods coming from foreign countries, as it was written in the bill, and hence it did not apply to goods coming from Porto Rico and the Philippine Islands. They made that distinction. It was an entirely different bill and an entirely different subject in that decision of the court. It is hardly worth while to multiply words upon this question. There is not an intelligent Member of this House that does not know to-day that upon this bill, referring to revenues solely on goods coming from the Philippine Islands, solely relating to revenues for the Philippine Islands, not in any sense a general tariff bill, an amendment like this—that is, an amendment to the Dingley law, an amendment based upon goods coming from foreign countries—are totally and wholly upon different subjects. And any man that votes to the contrary, with an intelligence sufficient to have a seat in the House of Representatives, stultifies his intelligence and not only rides over the rules of the House, but brings dishonor upon his acts by the very vote in that direction.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I have said this much, I think, properly addressed to the Chair. I should stop here, except that the gentleman from Mississippi seems to think that by some distinct right of his own selection he is leader of some gentlemen on this side of the House. I do not know to whom he refers. He wants to lead them. He wants to be your Moses. He wants to lead you into the wilderness. He has no good wishes for this side of the House. He wants to see our numbers lessened. He wants to see a Democratic majority in the next House. In the exuberance of his feelings the other day he fell into prophecy and prophesied an overwhelming majority sitting upon that side in the next Congress. It is not because he expects to see this amendment become a law, nor is it because he expects to see sugar cheaper in the United States. Not at all. He wants to construe the rules of this House. He wants to sit up there instead of down here. To that end he is disingenuous when he discusses this and does not discuss it as a matter of parliamentary law, and he does not dare to read the rule and expose the flagrant violation of it which he is proposing by this amendment.

Gentlemen, you may follow him to your political grave. There is no law to prevent it. If your conscience will not restrain you, you can go in that direction. But you can never go feeling that this amendment, referring as it does to the Philippine tariff act, an amendment changing the schedules of the Dingley Act, is germane; never able to convince yourselves that it is not upon a different subject that the one now in question. And I want to say that with all the Congresses that ever sat in these halls, Democrat or Republican, the only time in our parliamentary history that this salutary rule was disregarded, as the gentleman unwittingly said, was overturned and run over, was the sole occasion, the brief moment, when the Democratic caucus triumphed in the House, and it was soon utterly reversed by a majority of that House when again stated to them by the Chairman of the committee.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Wyoming desire to be heard on the point of order?

Mr. MONDELL. I do. Mr. Chairman, there are some of us on this side who would be glad to have an opportunity to vote on this amendment and who hope that the Chair in considering the amendment may find that he can, without violating parliamentary precedents and practice, hold that the amendment is germane.

Mr. Chairman, the House has once voted on a proposition practically on all fours with the one now before the House. It has been said here that the Cuban reciprocity bill referred to importations from a foreign country. For all the purposes of the present argument the Philippine Islands are in the same position as foreign territory, because the free passage of goods from them into our territory is only possible through special provisions of our tariff laws, and so an amendment to the Cuban reciprocity held by the House to be germane would also be germane to this bill. This is a bill providing for a change in sugar schedules; this is an amendment referring to sugar schedules. It treats of the subject-matter of the bill. The amendment as offered is coterminous with the legislation before the House. It would go into effect with this legislation and cease when the effect of that legislation ceased.

Now, it has been said that the House overturned its decision on a similar amendment, offered to the Cuban reciprocity bill, within a few moments after that decision was made. Mr. Chairman, I do not so understand it. A few moments after the House did reverse the decision of the Chair, and thereby established a rule, another amendment was offered. What sort of an amendment? An amendment to the sugar schedule? No. An amendment to any subject-matter of the bill before the House? Not at all. An amendment was offered to reduce the duty on hides. Well, I think that one need not be much of a parliamentarian to clearly understand that an amendment taking off the duty on hides is not germane to a bill proposing to change a certain sugar schedule, and the House very properly held that while you may amend the sugar schedule in the consideration of a bill relating to the sugar schedule you can not in the same connection take the duty off hides. So that the House has never overturned its decision in the Cuban reciprocity case. It is a rule of this body, established by its action by a large majority, and this is an amendment similar in character to the amendment referred to which the House voted onto the Cuban reciprocity bill and relating to the subject-matter of the bill under discussion.

Further, Mr. Chairman, it has been said that owing to the fact that there is a tariff on refined sugar in excess of the tariff on raw sugar the market for raw sugar is controlled by those who control the refined sugar market by reason of that tariff or differential. Now, we are proposing to aid the Philippine people in the development of the sugar industry. We desire to give them the full benefit of the legislation. If it be true, and it is not generally denied, that the differential makes it possible for certain parties to control the price of unrefined sugar coming into the country, it is certainly in line with the relief we are proposing in this bill to strike off the differential, and by so doing break down the control that certain gentlemen are said to have over the sugar market of the country and give these people the full benefit intended by the bill. Certainly an amendment which proposes to enlarge the sugar market, increasing the number of buyers, taking away from a certain class of gentlemen the advantage which they have over others in buying raw sugar—certainly such an amendment must be germane to a bill which proposes to benefit the Philippine people by reducing our sugar tariff in their favor.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. MONDELL. I should be very glad to.

Mr. MANN. Does the gentleman think an amendment taking the tariff off hides would be germane?

Mr. MONDELL. Well, I tried to make myself clear on that subject.

Mr. MANN. But the gentleman was arguing about a former decision. Does the gentleman think that a proposition to take the tariff off hides, made as an amendment to this bill, would be in order? And then I will ask him further, does not this bill include hides in its provisions just as much as it does sugar when it takes the duty off everything coming here, including hides?

Mr. MONDELL. In the arguments made on the Cuban reciprocity bill one gentleman contended that as sugar was not mentioned in the bill, therefore an amendment to the sugar schedule was not in order. We might adopt the same argument and say that as there is no definite reference to hides, the hide schedule could not be amended. It matters not, however, whether an amendment to the hide schedule would be germane to this bill. It was not germane to the Cuban reciprocity bill.

Mr. MANN. There is no mention made of hides in this bill. There is no definite reference to hides, but the tariff on hides is taken off with anything else that is coming from the Philippine Islands to this country, and what difference is there in the two?

Mr. MONDELL. An amendment is proposed to this bill that refers to sugar, and to nothing else, which we hope is germane. Any other amendments which may be offered must stand on their merits.

Mr. MANN. But supposing I should offer an amendment proposing to amend that particular feature of this bill, proposing to admit hides free of duty and extend it throughout the world, would the gentleman be prepared to vote that that would be in order?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Why, there are no hides coming from the Philippine Islands.

Mr. MANN. How does the gentleman know that?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Because every man who has ever been there says that there are no animals there to take the hides off from except the carabao. [Laughter.]

Mr. MANN. Well, we propose to admit carabao hides free by this bill. They are tough enough to make the best sort of shoes and boots for some of the members of the gentleman's party. [Laughter.]

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] has appealed to this House to disregard and override the rules of the House and to turn over the control of the House to the Democratic side upon the argument that the House of Representatives is more powerful than the Speaker and more powerful than the Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union. Now, let us see how long that argument will bear the light of careful analysis and inspection, and where an argument of a similar character will land the gentleman from Mississippi.

There is no power in the State of New York, we will say, so great as the people of the State of New York. They are greater in their power than the legislature, more potential than the governor, far greater in authority than the supreme court of the State of New York. There are laws in New York that inveigh against the crimes of murder and larceny and robbery and so forth. Suppose the people of New York see fit to say that they do not want to continue any longer those enactments, that they have finally concluded that a little killing and a little stealing would be a good thing. They have the right to say so, and they have the power to put it into operation. How will they do it? There is one of two ways in which they must go to work to do it. First, they must proceed in the way provided by the law to repeal the law, or, secondly, they must do it by mob and revolution. The exact condition confronts this House. Here stands the rule of the House, perfectly plain, absolutely known and read of all men, and the very argument of the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] practically admits the force of that proposition. Now, says the gentleman, this House is more powerful than that rule. That is true. This House is more potential than the Speaker. That is true, for they can turn him out to-day and put in somebody else.

The House is more powerful than the Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House; therefore it has the power to change that rule. I grant that; that is true. How? By what process? The power is lodged in the body of the House. How shall they do it? By the straightforward, legitimate way of changing the rule, or by mobocracy and anarchy and the overruling of the plain rules of the House by virtue of the power that a consolidated majority may possibly have? That is all there is now of this proposition; but there is another proposition, and the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] unfortunately fell into it, because it seemed to him to answer the purpose. It is said that a vote of the House in the Fifty-seventh Congress, upon this question of the repeal of the differential, stands as the law of the House, and that is the proposition upon which the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] has planted himself. Is that true, Mr. Chairman? Is that the law of this parliamentary body to-day? What power had the House of the Fifty-seventh Congress, either by a rule regularly adopted or by a revolutionary act of the House—what power, I say, had that House to bind this House? Now, it is very true that its decisions——

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Ohio yield to the gentleman from Mississippi?

Mr. GROSVENOR. Certainly.

Mr. WILLIAMS. What power has one court to bind a succeeding court, except the persuasive power of precedent?

Mr. GROSVENOR. Well, we will take up that persuasive power of precedent in a moment. I agree with the gentleman that it has no other power whatever, and I agree that the decision of a court in Mississippi has no authority in Ohio, and vice versa, the courts being of equal jurisdiction, except as they are persuasive the one upon the other.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Ah!

Mr. GROSVENOR. But under the constitution of your State your higher court absolutely binds your lower court by the terms of your constitution itself.

Mr. WILLIAMS. But the gentleman's reply does not answer my question. What authority has one court in Mississippi to bind another court in Mississippi, except the universal consensus of opinion that bodies construing statutes ought to follow precedents?

Mr. GROSVENOR. I have answered it already. If the court is of equal jurisdiction and has no constitutional authority to override the judgments of the other court, then their potentiality is merely persuasive and nothing more. But I have asked, What power had the Fifty-seventh Congress to bind this Congress? What power had the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union in that Congress upon a given question to bind this Congress, even upon the same question?

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. Will the gentleman allow me a question?

Mr. GROSVENOR. This is the second time the gentleman has cut me off.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. But I want to ask the gentleman a question upon this point.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I am coming to my points pretty well.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. I want to ask the gentleman if the Fifty-ninth Congress adopted the same rules that prevailed in the Fifty-seventh Congress? Knowing the construction that had been placed by the House in the Fifty-seventh Congress upon that rule, is it not an adoption of that rule and of that construction?

Mr. GROSVENOR. The gentleman from Kentucky himself will not say that that act of the House was anything but revolutionary in its character. He knows that, and that it was instantly reversed and repudiated, and then what happened? This is what I was coming to, and evidently the gentleman from Kentucky was aware of what I was leading up to and he sought to break me off a second time, when I was trying to get to that position. Now, because the Fifty-ninth Congress, with its eyes wide open to the fact that the Fifty-seventh Congress in an outbreak of bad temper, as we all understood at the time—regretted by every man on the floor of the House at that time and ever since—the House again in the Fifty-ninth Congress puts in the identical rule, and the Members of the House are morally and legally bound by that rule until, not by revolution, not by anarchy, not by an uprising in the interest of any special proposition, but deliberately and under the forms of law and parliamentary procedure, changes the rules of the House, and every man of the House is as much bound by this rule in conscience and in good citizenship as he is to any other rule of the House, and he ought not under any conditions to violate his oath of office, as it were, to revolutionize the House in that sort of a way. So, Mr. Chairman, instead of the precedent of the Fifty-seventh Congress being binding upon this Congress, the precedent of the Fifty-seventh Congress was overruled then, and this Congress stood upon the proposition that that ruling of that House was wrong and replaced in the rules the very proposition that had been sought by revolutionary procedure to be overturned.

Now, one word more. See the importance of standing by the rules of the House. We may be divided now upon the importance of this question upon the repeal of the differential on sugar. There may be somebody here who wants to destroy the sugar-beet industry, and that is the way to destruction more certain and inevitable than by any other process known to legislation. There may be such a man, and, Mr. Chairman, to-morrow there may be another combination that wants to do something else, and when you set a precedent of that character you have torn down the rule of regular procedure and have laid yourself open to combinations and conspiracies that operate by combinations and disregard the rules and law. Therefore I appeal to the Members of this House to stand by the rules of the House and the only safeguard of regular, orderly, and judicious procedure. [Applause.]

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Chairman, before the Chair rules I would like the Chair to listen further one moment. The gentleman who has just taken his seat has not shown his general clearness, although he has shown his usual impetuosity. Nobody has argued, nobody is arguing here, about the wisdom or unwisdom of the rule. What we are arguing about is the wisdom or unwisdom of the construction of the rule. Nobody is arguing that there ought not to be any rule as to germaneness; we are arguing that this motion to this particular proposition is germane. And in arguing that it is germane we have quoted the precedent made by the highest authority that can make a precedent upon the subject, to wit, the House itself.

Then the gentleman says that is "anarchy," that is "revolution;" revolution to appeal before a lower court to a precedent set by a higher. Revolution to quote a decision of the higher court to the higher court after the appeal has been made. Why, then, is the right of appeal put in the rules, in God's name, if it be anarchy and revolution to resort to it? But, Mr. Chairman, the sort of talk made by the gentleman from New York and the gentleman from Ohio does not frighten me now. In my younger days it did, and in the Fifty-seventh Congress especially they made my hair stand on end. And, strange to say, they used about the same arguments that they do now. They scolded after the same manner.

This morning I quoted the precedent coolly and deliberately, as a lawyer quotes a decision of the Supreme Court, and I said that the Chairman could not overrule the precedent. I did not say that the Supreme Court—the House—could not overrule the precedent, but the circuit court—the Chairman of the House; and then the gentleman tells me that in following the precedent of the House, in quoting the precedent of the House, in urging the Chair to follow the precedent of the House, I am guilty of anarchy, revolution, and I do not know what else. The gentleman says that the precedent of one House does not bind another. No; except in the sense that the precedent of the supreme court of Mississippi at one term binds a different supreme court passing upon the same question in another generation.

It does not follow that the House can not overrule itself any more than it follows that the Supreme Court can not overrule itself, though it is thought right not to do it, but it does follow that the circuit court can not overrule the Supreme Court and ought not to try it, and it does follow that the Chairman can not overrule the House and ought not to try it. What, then, is the duty of the Chairman? The Chairman is to rule with the precedent set by the House, and these gentlemen upon this side who are taking the absolutely indefensible position that the precedent is revolution and anarchy can in their turn, under the rules, appeal from the decision of the Chair, and then the House may, if it chooses, overrule its past judgment and reconsider or reconstrue the rule.

Mr. Chairman, a few more words about it. As to the point made by the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE], that these are different subject-matters, it has been answered so very completely by the gentleman from Wyoming that there is no necessity for me to talk about it any further. The gentleman has tried his old game. He tried it in the Fifty-seventh Congress—both gentlemen. It was their game then. It was an appeal to partisan prejudice and partisan hatred to try to influence the Chairman in the chair to rule wrong, as we thought then and as we have a greater right to say now, because the House afterwards agreed with us. Why, "because the Democrats want to override the organization, and because Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi wants to sit in that seat some time." [Applause on the Democratic side.] Suppose I did want to sit in that seat? What has that got to do with this? Suppose that the minority of the House that overruled the Chairman on this precise point of order in the Fifty-seventh Congress on a bill almost on all fours—the only difference in the two amendments being that was an amendment to cut off all differential, and this amendment is to cut it down 50 per cent—suppose that minority in that House was Democratic, and suppose that that minority was solid almost to a man, it never could have made that decision without enough votes upon this side of this Chamber to constitute a majority.

A majority of what? Of the House of Representatives of the American people, the highest judge of the meaning of its own rule. Oh, you can not befuddle the waters that way. You can not meet arguments by blind appeal to partisan hatred, and an appeal of that sort will not go down with the gentleman who is sitting in the chair. He is a partisan, but he is an honest one. He is a parliamentarian, too. He is a lawyer, and he knows that precedents bind succeeding inferior courts in honor, and they nearly always bind superior courts of coordinate power even. The gentleman accuses me of partisan purposes. It seems to me that he is the man who is showing them here. Why does not he answer the precedent? He goes off and takes up another case upon another subject and tries to answer it by quoting that. Now, Mr. Chairman, I hope the Chair is ready to rule. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

The CHAIRMAN. A rule of this House provides that "no motion or proposition on a subject different from that under consideration shall be admitted under color of an amendment." The question for the Chair to decide in the first instance, and possibly afterwards the committee, is not as to the wisdom of that rule nor whether it shall be changed, but whether this amendment is obnoxious to that rule. The Chair first will call attention to the antiquity of the rule, which has existed in its present form under every Administration in power since 1822, and will take occasion to refer very briefly to a few decisions showing the strictness with which it has been interpreted. The Chair will not refer to decisions by Chairmen of the Committee of the Whole, but to Speakers of this House. In the Fifty-first Congress there was a bill before the House called a "pure-food bill," regulating lard and its products or compound lard. An amendment was offered relating to all food products, just as this bill relates to certain products and the amendment seeks to extend it over a general class, and yet the Speaker, Thomas B. Reed, ruled that the amendment was not germane. In the Fifty-third Congress a proposition was made to discharge a Member of the House from the custody of the Sergeant-at-Arms. An amendment was offered discharging another Member or other Members. It was ruled not to be germane. That ruling, it is true, was by the Chairman of the Committee of the Whole, but a most distinguished parliamentarian, Mr. Richardson of Tennessee, who subsequently received the vote of his party for the office of Speaker.

Again, Speaker Reed ruled that to a paragraph providing for annual clerks to Senators an amendment providing clerks for Members was not in order. And it has been held that to a bill relating to one Territory an amendment relating to another Territory was not germane. That was ruled, not by a Chairman of the Committee of the Whole, but by no less a distinguished parliamentarian than Speaker Carlisle. And, again, it was ruled in the Fifty-third Congress that to a bill admitting one Territory into the Union an amendment relating to the admission of another Territory was not germane. That was not ruled by a Chairman of the Committee of the Whole, but by the last Speaker who came from the minority side of the House, Mr. Crisp. He made two rulings upon that subject in the same session. Mr. William Jennings Bryan having offered a bill for the relief of the State of Nebraska to reimburse it for expenditures incurred in repelling an invasion of the Sioux Indians, an amendment was offered extending the provisions to the State of South Dakota, which had suffered in precisely the same way and from the same cause. Mr. Bryan argued that it would be as well to put all the bills on the Calendar into one bill as to accept that amendment as germane. His point of order was sustained by Speaker Crisp. It was held by Speaker Reed that, to a bill to protect trade and commerce against trusts, an amendment authorizing the suspension of duties upon articles handled by trusts was not germane.

For instance, Speaker Reed also ruled that to a provision excluding all immigrants who could not read and write an amendment excluding all foreign-born laborers was not germane. And so the Chair might go through a long list of similar rulings. But it is said that in the Fifty-seventh Congress a ruling was made, and upon appeal overruled, and that the action of the House in the Committee of the Whole on that occasion ought to be binding upon the present occupant of the chair.

It is true that when there was pending a bill providing for reciprocal duties with Cuba, not only upon sugar, but also upon hides, and, indeed, including all products of that island, an amendment was offered touching the duties upon sugar from all the countries of the world. And it is true that, that amendment having been held not germane by the very distinguished parliamentarian who then occupied the chair, Mr. Sherman of New York, his ruling was upon appeal reversed by the committee. But the Chair finds that immediately afterwards an amendment touching hides was offered, whereupon the same point of order was again made, when the same Chairman said:

> The Chair desires to say that under the ruling of the committee overruling the Chair a few moments ago quite likely that would be in order, but the Chair's views have not been modified by the action of the committee, and the Chair holds the amendment not germane and out of order.

Thereupon, an appeal having been taken, the committee sustained the Chair by a vote of 183 to 70, or more than 2 to 1, distinctly overruling its previous action.

Then, again, this very morning, upon the appeal of the gentleman from Massachusetts, this committee sustained the Chair in a ruling entirely in line with the ruling then sustained as to the duty on hides. So that if the present occupant of the chair felt bound by rulings of the committee he would feel bound by the last two, rather than by the one which the committee itself seems to have reversed. But the Chair desires to call attention distinctly to the fact that the amendment now pending, offered by the gentleman from Missouri, is by no means on a par with the amendment concerning which the reversal occurred in the previous Congress. That, as the Chair has stated, was a bill providing for reciprocal duties with Cuba. It provided for a certain proclamation to be made by the President, and the amendment was ingeniously worded so as to provide that "upon the making of said agreement and the issuance of said proclamation, and while said agreement shall remain in force, there shall be levied, collected, and paid, in lieu of the duties on sugar," certain other duties.

It was ingeniously interwoven and connected with, had relation to, and included some matters in the original bill to which it was offered as an amendment.

But the amendment offered by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CLARK] and now pending is surely upon a different subject-matter from the bill, because it by exception clearly excludes everything that is touched by the bill. The Chair will call attention to the wording of the amendment:

Amend by inserting the following: "Except on Philippine sugar there shall, after the approval of this bill by the President of the United States, be levied, collected, and paid"—

Certain duties on all sugars.

It does not even touch sugar coming from the Philippines or any of the products of the Philippines, which are the only subjects of the bill to which it is offered as an amendment. This amendment relates only to sugar which does not come from the Philippine Islands. Clearly it is a different subject-matter from that in the bill, which relates only to sugar and other products coming from the Philippine Islands.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair feels very certain that the distinguished gentleman who now rises to interrupt, if he were called on in this chair to interpret the rule, would hold as the Chair now holds, that the amendment is on a subject not contained in the bill at all, and therefore a different subject and not germane to the bill. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. WILLIAMS. A parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. WILLIAMS. If this amendment should be altered so as to meet the last objection made by the Chair—the fact that, in his opinion, it does not touch the Philippine sugar at all—will the Chair then hold that such an amendment is not germane?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair can only say that it will pass upon different amendments as they are offered. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. With great respect personally for the Chair, I appeal from that decision.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri appeals from the decision of the Chair. The question, therefore, is: Shall the decision of the Chair stand as the judgment of the committee?

The question was taken and the Chairman announced that the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Division, Mr. Chairman.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 220, noes 120.

So the decision of the Chair was sustained. [Loud applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. WILLIAMS. I offer an amendment, Mr. Chairman. Having succeeded in reuniting the Republican party [laughter on the Republican side] by undertaking to make an attack upon the sugar trust, an object which always reunites them [cheers and loud applause on the Democratic side], I beg leave to offer as a substitute for the pending bill the bill (H. R. 406) that I send to the Clerk's desk.

Mr. PAYNE. Before that is done, Mr. Chairman, I call attention to section 2, a committee amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The second section has not been read.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Oh, yes; I am perfectly willing for the second section to be adopted first.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair deems it proper to state, in order to avoid any misunderstanding on the part of gentlemen who may desire to offer amendments, that if any other amendments are to be considered to this section of the bill, they ought to be offered previous to the reading of the proposed new section printed in the bill as an amendment adopted by the Ways and Means Committee.

Mr. SULLIVAN of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 3, line 12, insert after the word "islands" the following: "Or of the United States, its Territories or possessions, manufactured or unmanufactured."

Mr. PAYNE. I make the point of order that it is not germane. It extends the provision of the bill to other Territories than the Philippine Islands, if I can understand it. It is a little blind.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Massachusetts desire to be heard upon the point of order?

Mr. SULLIVAN of Massachusetts. I do.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will hear the gentleman briefly.

Mr. SULLIVAN of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, this is a bill which undertakes to fix the relations of the Philippine Islands and the United States. The particular part of the bill to which the amendment is offered provides for the establishment of free trade between the United States and the Philippine Islands after the 11th of April, 1909.

The object of this part of the bill is undoubtedly to establish absolute free trade between the Philippine Islands and the United States. It seems to me that the language of the bill does not fully accomplish that. The amendment therefore provides that not only the articles which are wholly the growth and product of the Philippine Islands may be exported to the United States without the collection of duty in the United States upon them, but that also any articles which may be exported from the United States or any of its Territories to the Philippine Islands and subsequently reexported from the Philippine Islands to the United States may also be admitted free of duty. In other words, the intention of this amendment is to create the same relation between the Philippine Islands and the United States that exists to-day between the several States of this Union. If some one in Missouri, for example, wished to ship corn to the State of Iowa, there to be ground into meal, and it were ground into meal in the State of Iowa, it could be shipped back to the State of Missouri and sold as meal without the intervention of any tariff duty. If after 1909 some one chose for some reason, commercial or fanciful, to export corn from the United States to the Philippine Islands, to be there ground into meal and reshipped to the United States, then under this amendment that might be done without any tariff being levied upon the meal thus exported from the Philippine Islands to the United States. In my judgment, without this amendment such a thing as I have just described could not come to pass. And so, to leave the language of the bill wholly free from doubt and to establish in 1909 a condition of absolute free trade between the Philippines and the United States, this amendment is offered, which seems to be entirely in order, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will hear the gentleman from New York, if he desires.

Mr. PAYNE. I think, in view of the explanation of the gentleman, that the amendment is germane, but I hope it will be voted down.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is of the opinion that the amendment is germane.

Mr. PAYNE. I call for a vote.

Mr. SULLIVAN of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, just a word. Here is the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE] admitting that the amendment is germane to the bill, and as the bill which he has drawn has attempted to establish free trade between the Philippine Islands and the United States, I can not understand why he asks now that this amendment be voted down. It has been offered in the most friendly spirit. Indeed, it has been offered as a perfecting amendment, if any product of the Ways and Means Committee is left in such a state as to admit of improvement. I believe that this leaves the intention of the bill wholly free from doubt. Without the amendment, it seems to me that any articles which are sent to the Philippine Islands from the United States, or Porto Rico or Hawaii, could not be shipped back to the United States without having levied upon those articles the usual tariff rates. Under this bill the same freedom of intercourse would be established between the Philippine Islands and the United States that exists to-day between the forty-five States and four Territories of this Union, and I can not understand upon what ground the objection of the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE] is based. I would be much obliged to him if he will state the reason of his objection to the House.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. SULLIVAN of Massachusetts. Yes.

Mr. MANN. Would the gentleman's amendment apply to goods coming from the Panama Canal Zone to the Philippines, and then coming from the Philippines to the United States?

Mr. SULLIVAN of Massachusetts. I presume it would, if the Canal Zone is admitted to be a part of the territory of the United States. I take it, under that condition, if goods were shipped from there to the Philippine Islands and subsequently shipped to the United States, under this amendment they would come in free of duty after 1909.

Mr. MANN. If the gentleman will pardon me, the exact status that will be taken to control the Canal Zone has never been definitely fixed. The Republic of Panama retains the sovereignty of the Canal Zone, and in order to preserve our relations with the Republic of Panama in the last Congress we provided that goods coming from the Canal Zone to this country should pay the ordinary duty, and we have abolished our custom-houses down there, so that we do not preserve custom-houses on the Canal Zone. I fear that the gentleman's amendment would upset that whole arrangement, which was very satisfactory to the Panama people and undoubtedly preserved us from a great deal of trouble.

Mr. SULLIVAN of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, if that is the sole objection to this, it seems to me that the amendment ought to be adopted. I can not imagine anyone sending goods from the United States proper to the Canal Zone, and subsequently shipping those goods to the Philippine Islands, and then shipping the same goods back to the United States. That seems to me to be so fanciful an objection as not to weigh seriously against this amendment. But I would like to ask again if the gentleman from New York will state the grounds of his objection to this amendment?

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I am very much surprised that the gentlemen who are supporting this bill do not accept this amendment. Certainly it is in line with the measure and goes far toward perfecting it, and it seems to me that in order to be consistent the gentlemen who are following the Democratic party toward free trade and assisting them in breaking down the Republican policy of protection certainly ought to go a little farther and perfect their measure.

Mr. Chairman, a moment ago a gentleman on the other side said something in regard to the attitude of those of us who have been opposing this bill in the matter of appealing from the decision of the Chair. I attempted to secure recognition at that time, but was not able to do so. I simply wish to say that those of us who have not been in favor of this measure have attempted in all things to conduct ourselves in a reasonable and consistent manner. We are attempting to uphold the Republican policy of protection to American industries. We would have been pleased, many of us, to have voted on the amendment of the gentleman from Missouri, but the Chair having ruled, and the ruling of the Chair having clearly indicated that at least there is a grave doubt with regard to the amendment being germane to the bill, we who have been opposing the bill felt disposed to accept the decision of the Chair and leave to the gentlemen who are supporting the bill the questionable honor and distinction of joining with the opposition to carry out their objects and purposes.

They have joined with Democratic free traders to bring about the passage of this measure. We desire to remain consistent as Republican protectionists, and will not join in any revolutionary action to overturn a decision of the Chair, which seems, at least, to be in line with the majority of the decisions heretofore. We may not win. We shall at least be consistent, and while our leaders urge and approve measures which are to depend for their large majorities on the votes of those who continually denounce and assail Republican protective tariff doctrines, we shall be content that our vote, though it may be small, shall be of those on this side who are always true to our party policy of protection. [Applause.]

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman from New York if it is a fact that under this bill, if one should ship corn to the Philippine Islands and grind it into meal, or not grind it, and ship it back here, he would be required under the law and under this bill to pay a duty to get that corn or meal back into the United States?

Mr. MANN. They would send that man to the insane asylum. [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the adoption of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. SULLIVAN of Massachusetts) there were—ayes 104, noes 160.

So the amendment was lost.

Mr. PARKER. Mr. Chairman, I desire to submit an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 2, lines 12 and 13, strike out the words "the act of the United States Philippine Commission referred to in section 1 of this act" and insert the word "law."

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Chairman, I accept that amendment.

Mr. WILLIAMS. What is the nature of the amendment?

Mr. PARKER. The act of the United States Philippine Commission referred to is as dead as a door nail.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Ah, I understand the nature of it.

The question was taken; and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PAYNE. Now, Mr. Chairman, I offer section 2 as a committee amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Add as section 2 the following:

"SEC. 2. That on and after the day when this act shall go into effect all goods, wares, and merchandise previously imported from the Philippine Islands, for which no entry has been made, and all goods, wares, and merchandise previously entered without payment of duty and under bond for warehousing, transportation, or any other purpose, for which no permit of delivery to the importer or his agent has been issued, shall be subjected to the duties imposed by law prior to the passage of this act, and to no other duty, upon the entry or the withdrawal thereof: Provided, That when duties are based upon the weight of merchandise deposited in any public or private bonded warehouse said duties shall be levied and collected upon the weight of such merchandise at the time of its entry."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment offered by the gentleman from New York.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Chairman, I understand that the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] desires to offer his amendment as a substitute in the House and not in the committee.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I think, Mr. Chairman, that that will save time.

Mr. PAYNE. I will yield to the gentleman in the House for the purpose of offering a substitute. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise, report the bill with amendments to the House, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and the bill be passed.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. OLMSTED, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 3) to amend an act entitled "An act temporarily to provide revenue for the Philippine Islands, and for other purposes," approved March 8, 1902, and had directed him to report the same back with sundry amendments, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.

The SPEAKER. Is there a separate vote demanded upon the amendments; if not, the vote will be taken in gross.

The question was taken, and the amendments were agreed to.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Mississippi to offer a substitute.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, I now desire to offer a substitute for the pending bill H. R. 406.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the substitute.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That from and after the date of the passage of this act all goods, wares, merchandise, or other articles, being the growth or product of any of the islands forming a part of the archipelago called the Philippines, when shipped to any port of Hawaii, Porto Rico, or to any other port of the United States, shall enter any said port free of import duty.

SEC. 2. That from and after the passage of this act all goods, wares, merchandise, and other articles, being the growth or product of Porto Rico, Hawaii, or any other appurtenance, Territory, or State of the domain of the United States, when shipped to any port of the Philippines shall enter any said port free of import duty.

SEC. 3. That all existing provisions of law enacted by the Congress, by the Philippine Commission, or by any other authority whatsoever, civil or military, which are in conflict with the provisions of this act are hereby repealed: Provided, however, That nothing herein contained shall be construed to repeal the provisions of the treaty of peace entered into at Paris, France, on the 10th day of December, 1898, by and between the United States of America and His Majesty the King of Spain, and confirmed by the Senate of the United States on the 6th day of February, 1899.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, this amendment was read in the committee and had reference there to importations from the Island of Guam, and I made the point of order against it. The gentleman has now eliminated that and I think the amendment is in order, and therefore I move the previous question on the amendments and bill to its passage.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Before the gentleman does that I would like to have about three minutes to explain the substitute.

Mr. PAYNE. I understood the gentleman said he did not want to debate it.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I do not.

Mr. PAYNE. I yield five minutes to the gentleman.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I think three minutes will be plenty. I certainly am not physically disposed to take more than three minutes if I can help it. Mr. Speaker, the substitute simply does this: It provides that trade between the Philippines and the balance of the United States shall be as free as the trade that exists now between New York and Georgia, with the exception that no part of the bill shall violate any provision of our treaty with Spain. That treaty is not violated by any provision of the bill now anyhow, in my opinion, but some people thought it might violate some provision. We have an engagement with Spain to treat her as ourselves in commercial relations with the Philippine Islands up to April 11, 1909. Now, then, treating her as ourselves and giving her equal privileges there means, of course, that where we reduce duties for the Filipinos as a consideration of a reduction of their duties to us Spain must give exactly the same consideration to arrive at exactly the same result; but as nobody expects, even in a remote degree, that Spain will admit all Philippine products free to her shores there will be no violation of the treaty at all, because Spain will never give equal consideration for equal treatment. If it touches the treaty at all, the sole effect would be that Spain could ship goods free to the Philippines, provided Spain allowed the Filipinos to ship goods free to her. With this explanation,

Mr. Speaker, and without arguing the question, I would be glad to have a vote.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, I renew my demand for the previous question.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York demands the previous question.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the substitute offered by the gentleman from Mississippi.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, in order to save the time of the House, as it is now growing late, I think we had better have the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 106, nays 232, answered "present" 3, not voting 44, as follows:

SENATE.

WEDNESDAY, January 17, 1906.

Prayer by Rev. ULYSSES G. B. PIERCE, of the city of Washington.

The Secretary proceeded to read the Journal of yesterday's proceedings, when, on request of Mr. KEAN and by unanimous consent, the further reading was dispensed with.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Journal stands approved.

PRINTING FOR DEPARTMENT OF COMMERCE AND LABOR.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of Commerce and Labor, transmitting a draft of a bill providing for the printing of additional copies of any report, document, or publication issued by the Department of Commerce and Labor whenever there is a demand or necessity therefor; which, with the accompanying paper, was referred to the Committee on Printing, and ordered to be printed.

REPORT OF NATIONAL ACADEMY OF SCIENCES.

Mr. WETMORE. I present the annual report of the National Academy of Sciences for the year 1905, as required by statute. The statute also provides for the printing of the report, so that no action is necessary on the part of the Senate, but simply to receive the report.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The report will be printed.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. W. J. BROWNING, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House had passed a bill (H. R. 3) to amend an act entitled "An act temporarily to provide revenue for the Philippine Islands, and for other purposes," approved March 8, 1902; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The message also announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bill and joint resolution; and they were thereupon signed by the Vice-President:

A bill (S. 2558) authorizing the Washington Bridge Company to construct a bridge across the Columbia River near the city of Wenatchee, Wash.; and

A joint resolution (H. J. Res. 68) relating to the contingent expenses of the House of Representatives.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. CULBERSON, from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, to whom was referred the bill (S. 339) to provide for the enlargement and improvement of the public building at Fort Worth, Tex., reported it with an amendment.

Mr. PERKINS, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1265) to erect a memorial tablet to Ensign John R. Monaghan, United States Navy, asked to be discharged from its further consideration and that it be referred to the Committee on the Library; which was agreed to.

Mr. WARREN, from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, to whom was referred the bill (S. 610) to provide for the purchase of a site and the erection of a public building thereon at Sheridan, in the State of Wyoming, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. McCUMBER (for Mr. LA FOLLETTE), from the Committee on Pensions, to whom were referred the following bills, reported them severally without amendment, and submitted reports thereon:

A bill (S. 666) granting an increase of pension to Andrew Patrick;

A bill (S. 669) granting an increase of pension to Laurence Mericle;

A bill (S. 670) granting an increase of pension to Anthony Barrett; and

A bill (S. 1303) granting a pension to Harrison Brott.

Mr. HALE. I am directed by the Committee on Naval Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. 2653) for the relief of John H. Lohman, to ask to be discharged from its further consideration and that it be referred to the Committee on Appropriations. It is a matter of deficiency.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Committee on Naval Affairs will be discharged from the further consideration of the bill, and it will, with the accompanying papers, be referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. ALGER, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 727) granting an increase of pension to Jasper H. Keys, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

He also, from the same committee, to whom were referred the following bills, reported them each with an amendment, and submitted reports thereon:

A bill (S. 1015) granting an increase of pension to Joseph McSwain; and

A bill (S. 2256) granting an increase of pension to Alexander F. McConnell.

GEORGE A. RAHN.

Mr. KEAN. I am directed by the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, to whom was referred the resolution submitted by the Senator from Idaho [Mr. HEYBURN] on the 15th instant, to report it favorably without amendment, and I ask for its present consideration.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Senate be, and he hereby is, authorized and directed to pay from the "miscellaneous items" of the contingent fund of the Senate the funeral expenses and physician's bill of George A. Rahn, late a policeman of the Senate, not to exceed $200, in full of all other allowances.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from New Jersey asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of the resolution. Is there objection?

Mr. HALE. It is a very small matter and perhaps not of account enough to take up the time of the Senate, but is this the practice of the Senate?

Mr. KEAN. I will say to the Senator from Maine that it is the practice of the Senate to pay one-half year's salary. In this instance it is proposed to pay only the actual funeral expenses and physician's bill, because the person left no heirs.

Mr. HALE. Is there a precedent for paying the funeral expenses?

Mr. KEAN. There is.

Mr. GALLINGER. Of policemen?

Mr. KEAN. Of policemen. It has been done three or four times.

Mr. HALE. Does it go beyond policemen?

Mr. KEAN. It extends to any employee of the Senate. It has always been done.

Mr. GALLINGER. This was a Capitol policeman?

Mr. KEAN. He was a Capitol policeman, and it is proposed to pay the actual expenses. If half a year's salary were given, more money, of course, would be paid.

Mr. HALE. Has the Senator discovered any case where the Senate does not pay bills?

Mr. KEAN. I can answer the Senator from Maine by saying I think the Senate is most liberal in paying all bills.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair hears no objection to the request of the Senator from New Jersey for the present consideration of the resolution. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

OWNERSHIP OF LAND IN THE PHILIPPINES.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate the resolution submitted yesterday by the Senator from Texas [Mr. CULBERSON]. It will be read.

The Secretary read the resolution, as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, directed to inform the Senate whether any official or officials of the Philippine government own any lands in the Philippine Islands or any interest or right therein; and, if so, to inform the Senate what that ownership or interest is, where the land is situated, and who the official or officials are.

Mr. CULBERSON. I desire to offer a resolution in lieu of that, and I ask for its present consideration.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The resolution will be read.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, directed to inform the Senate whether any member of the Philippine Commission, or any officer of the Army or Navy of the United States, directly or indirectly, owned on December 1, 1905, or now owns any land in the Philippine Islands, or had at that time or now has any interest or right in such land of any character; and, if so, to inform the Senate what such ownership, interest, or right is; where the land is situated, particularly with reference to the location of proposed railroads in said islands, and who said officials are.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the resolution as modified by the Senator from Texas.

The resolution as modified was agreed to.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

The bill (H. R. 3) to amend an act entitled "An act temporarily to provide revenue for the Philippine Islands, and for other purposes" approved March 8, 1902, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Philippines.

PURE-FOOD BILL.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, pursuant to the notice which I gave yesterday, I will call up Senate bill 88 and ask that the Senate fix a time for taking a final vote on the bill. It was the understanding at the time of adjournment yesterday that an effort would be made this morning to fix a time for a vote. I ask unanimous consent that on the 1st of February at four o'clock the amendments may be disposed of and that the bill may be finally voted upon.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Idaho asks the unanimous consent of the Senate that the vote may be taken on Senate bill 88 on February 1, at 4 o'clock. Is there objection to the request?

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, at present I must object. I have examined the bill carefully. There are provisions in it upon which I want more information from constituents of mine who are interested in those provisions; and while I shall not at a later day object to an assignment, not very far ahead, and shall not attempt in any way to obstruct the passage of the bill, I am not prepared at present to agree to a day being fixed. The Senator will get his day. He need have no fear about that.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Objection being made, the bill will go to the Calendar.

EXISTING STATUS IN SANTO DOMINGO.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President, pursuant to the notice given on Monday last, I ask that the resolution I send to the desk may be called up in order that I may submit some remarks on it.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The resolution will be read.

The Secretary read the resolution submitted by Mr. TILLMAN on the 4th instant, as follows:

Resolved, That the President be requested to inform the Senate, if not incompatible with the public welfare, as to the existing status in Santo Domingo; whether or not President Morales carried his Government with him when he disappeared from the capital or whether he left it behind, and whether the American officers who have been in charge of the custom-houses are still performing that work; and, if so, under what arrangement and by what authority.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President, there are those who will probably be disposed to criticise one paragraph in the resolution, because it is not couched in that language of decorum or dignity which some people seem to think is essential always in this body. But I thought over that matter very carefully before I worded the resolution as I did. The reason why I asked for information in regard to Mr. Morales's government, or President Morales's government, was because of my own belief that there is not now and there has not been during a year or more, or any time, say, in ten years past, anything other than a military dictatorship in the island of Santo Domingo. And as we were dealing with this supposed government there in a rather remarkable way, and to my mind in an utterly unauthorized way, I wanted to bring out the fact as to what kind of government we are dealing with, and therefore I wrote the phrase which has caused some criticism.

In order to open up what I shall say this morning in an orderly manner, I propose to read some brief extracts from the annual message of President Roosevelt at the opening of this session of Congress. He said, speaking of the Monroe doctrine:

We must recognize the fact that in some South American countries there has been much suspicion lest we should interpret the Monroe doctrine as in some way inimical to their interests, and we must try to convince all the other nations of this continent once and for all that no just and orderly government has anything to fear from us.

Mr. President, the first point to which I desire to direct attention is the closing sentence of this paragraph, that "Once and for all, no just and orderly government has anything to fear from us." Is it to be understood, then, that the converse of the proposition is true, and that unjust and disorderly governments have something to fear from us? I have understood through the press, and I confess I should like to have light, and I therefore ask the question, and I would be glad to have the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] give me his attention for a moment. I have seen it stated somewhere in my multifarious reading that the Senator from Massachusetts, in an interview, or speech, or a letter, or something, some time, somewhere, declared that the action of the President in Santo Domingo is the beginning of a new and important departure in our foreign relations. He can verify the statement, or not, just as he sees fit. If he denies it, of course I take it that it is not true.

Mr. LODGE. Does the Senator want an answer now? I prefer to follow the Senator later. I do not want to interfere.

Mr. TILLMAN. Well, just for a moment; if the Senator does not mind, I should like for him to say yes or no to that inquiry.

Mr. LODGE. I know what the Senator wishes. No; I did not use the word the Senator quotes.

Mr. TILLMAN. Does the Senator hold the view that this is a new and important departure in our foreign relations?

Mr. LODGE. I did not use the word "departure."

Mr. TILLMAN. I am not talking about the words just now.

Mr. LODGE. At the proper time and in my own time——

Mr. TILLMAN. Oh, I beg the Senator's pardon.

Mr. LODGE. I will tell the Senator exactly what I did say. It was in a speech. I have no desire to conceal it—not the least in the world.

Mr. TILLMAN. I had not supposed that for a minute, but I did not want to do the Senator an injustice, and therefore I did not want to proceed under a false or wrong premise.

Mr. LODGE. The Senator asked if I used the words he quoted. I say no.

Mr. TILLMAN. All right.

Mr. LODGE. I did discuss the Santo Domingo policy, and I did state that it was something new, but I did not use the word "departure." I will give the Senator the exact words later.

Mr. TILLMAN. I shall be glad to hear the Senator, and hear his exposition of the new policy we have entered upon.

Mr. LODGE. I have not changed my views at all.

Mr. TILLMAN. I do not suppose the Senator has.

I asked a moment ago if the converse of the proposition laid down by President Roosevelt is to be considered as true, that when he says "We must try to convince all the other nations of this continent once and for all that no just and orderly government has anything to fear from us" whether any unjust and disorderly government has anything to fear from us, because therein lie possibilities for an immense amount of trouble to this country and its people, as I understand it. This whole question, as I see it, involver the purpose, as clearly set forth by the President in succeeding portions of this message which I will read, to compel, if need be, the people of the South American republics to pursue a line of government and a policy which in his judgment will entitle them to be called just and orderly governments; and with that position I want to take issue.

The President goes on:

Moreover, we must make it evident that we do not intend to permit the Monroe doctrine to be used by any nation on this continent as a shield to protect it from the consequences of its own misdeeds against foreign nations. If a republic to the south of us commits a tort against a foreign nation, such as an outrage against a citizen of that nation, then the Monroe doctrine does not force us to interfere to prevent punishment of the tort, save to see that the punishment does not assume the form of territorial occupation in any shape. The case is more difficult when it refers to a contractual obligation. Our own Government has always refused to enforce such contractual obligations on behalf of its citizens by an appeal to arms. It is much to be wished that all foreign governments would take the same view. But they do not; and in consequence we are liable at any time to be brought face to face with disagreeable alternatives. On the one hand, this country would certainly decline to go to war to prevent a foreign government from collecting a just debt; on the other hand, it is very inadvisable to permit any foreign power to take possession, even temporarily, of the custom-houses of an American republic in order to enforce the payment of its obligations, for such temporary occupation might turn into a permanent occupation.

Now, Mr. President, the eloquent Senator from Maryland [Mr. RAYNER] in his splendid argument last week, to my mind, presented unanswerable reasons, based on the facts of history and the record of our foreign relations for three-quarters of a century, that it is not the Monroe doctrine, that it is no part or parcel of it, for people to the south of us to commit an injury and then expect us to protect them—I mean an injury such as is mentioned here. But he equally and with emphasis showed what the Monroe doctrine was and is and to his exposition of that doctrine I for one am committed as far as I am able to go, even to the extent of war or voting for war.

But when we start out on a new departure contemplating the turning of this Government into a receiver in bankruptcy to adjudicate the claims of bondholders and others to whom these republics have become indebted—and it is contended that it is our duty to constitute this government a policeman to keep these people in order, to give them good and stable government, or "just and orderly government," to quote the President's words—I say we have gone far off and out of our orbit and away from all reasonable and proper interpretation of the duties of the United States toward its neighbors.

The President continues, by way of justification of his action in Santo Domingo:

The only escape from these alternatives may at any time be that we must ourselves undertake to bring about some arrangement by which so much as possible of a just obligation shall be paid. It is far better that this country should put through such an arrangement, rather than allow any foreign country to undertake it. To do so insures the defaulting republic from having to pay debts of an improper character under duress, while it also insures honest creditors of the republic from being passed by in the interest of dishonest or grasping creditors. Moreover, for the United States to take such a position offers the only possible way of insuring us against a clash with some foreign power. The position is, therefore, in the interest of peace as well as in the interest of justice. It is of benefit to our people; it is of benefit to foreign peoples; and most of all it is really of benefit to the people of the country concerned.

Now, Mr. President, is it true that it will be a benefit to the people of this country for us to get ourselves into a war and become embroiled with one of these Spanish-American countries to the south of us, that we shall step forward with a policeman's club and with a bondholder's claim and say to any government which may be in existence there now: "Here we are, your big brother. You are not behaving right; you have got to settle, and if you will not settle we will whip you and make you settle." That is the sum and substance of this new policy.

Does anybody suppose for a minute that we can continue to intermeddle with one republic after another, with threats of coercion in the event of their refusal or failure to do as the President thinks is right and just, and not become embroiled in a war? You say we could crush them easily. Of course we could in time do it, but what will be the cost and expense to us to enter upon this hazardous and untried experiment in endeavoring to wrench the Monroe doctrine and stretch it beyond all decency?

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from South Carolina yield to the Senator from Texas?

Mr. TILLMAN. With pleasure.

Mr. CULBERSON. The Senator has just read from the President's message to the effect that it would work great injury if some such course as he suggests is not pursued with reference to Santo Domingo. In line with the suggestion of the Senator, if he will permit me just here, I will be glad to read what the late Secretary Hay said upon that particular question.

Mr. TILLMAN. I should be very glad to have the Senator read it. I am speaking somewhat by the courtesy of the Senator from Florida [Mr. MALLORY], who has the floor at the expiration of the morning hour to pursue the discussion of the ship-subsidy bill. I presume that possibly we will get an accommodation, so that all who want to be heard will be given an opportunity. I shall be glad to have the Senator read it.

Mr. CULBERSON. The paper I read is embodied in an editorial in the New York Sun of July 3, 1905, and purports to be an extract from a letter by the late Secretary of State, which I will read:

I had never seen the protocol or agreement or whatever one may call it until, by my order, it was telegraphed to Washington, after having been signed and published in Santo Domingo. As soon as I saw it it was evident that it required serious modification and yet, at the same time, I did approve and still do approve the conduct of Dawson and Dillingham in signing it, and do not especially disapprove the conduct of the Santo Domingo people in publishing it.

There was what might be called a critical state of things in Santo Domingo, if such a phrase is applicable to a country where every day has its crisis, and I thought and still think that Dawson and Dillingham acted rightly in going beyond their instructions and proceeding, without orders, to draw up a document which was not accepted when it reached us. This is, perhaps, a hard saying for anybody else to accept, but it is the simple truth and I shall not dodge any responsibility connected with it.

I fear you can not relieve me of the stigma of having employed Dillingham. He went to Santo Domingo at my request on account of his extensive knowledge of the country and the personnel of the Government.

One of the humors of the situation is that the paragraph [in the treaty] to which the Senate has most strenuously objected, and which they have stricken out in their new version, was inserted by the preliminary "advice and consent" of the ablest man in the House and the ablest man in the Senate, where foreign affairs are concerned.

But what I want particularly to call attention to, Mr. President, is this paragraph:

If they should pass the treaty as it is amended, according to the newspaper reports, though I do not think it is improved, I do think it will still be workable. If they reject it, I do not think it would be a great disaster, and it would certainly relieve the Executive of a vast amount of labor which is now imposed upon him by the claims of American citizens throughout all Latin America.

The purpose in reading this, Mr. President, is to place against what has been read by the Senator from South Carolina from the President of the United States as to the great disaster which will result by the failing to pursue the course suggested by him the opinion of the late Secretary of State that it will not be disastrous, and, in his judgment, will work no great disaster.

Mr. FORAKER. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from South Carolina yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. TILLMAN. I do.

Mr. FORAKER. I rise merely to make an inquiry. Does the article which the Senator has read state to whom the letter was written by Mr. Hay?

Mr. CULBERSON. It does not.

Mr. FORAKER. What is the statement of the article in that respect, I ask, if the Senator from South Carolina will bear with me long enough to have it read?

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. President, I have read what purports to be an extract from a letter of the late Secretary Hay, which is reproduced in the New York Sun of Monday, July 3, 1905, in the first editorial of that day.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President, when this subject was first precipitated by me before the Senate—if that phrase is proper—I did not intend to excite any discussion about it, because I was starting off on another line and merely brought in Santo Domingo as an illustration of some of the peculiarities and, as I thought, unwise official actions of our Chief Executive, usurpation of authority, and so forth. The Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. SPOONER], as I recall his words, stated that the President was not carrying out the treaty which the Senate had failed to ratify. I think we had some little passage about my use of the word "trickery," to which the Senator very seriously objected. I was not then so well posted in this matter as I now am, though I am not now so well posted as I should like to be. I want to say, for the information of the Senator from Wisconsin and others, that in that same New York Sun, which I regard as a very able and usually a very clean newspaper, certainly one whose news service is hardly surpassed or equaled in the United States, and whose editorial columns are almost a liberal education to one who will read them, because of the beautiful and terse English in which they are couched—I say that same New York Sun, of March 28, 1905, has this on its first page, in a dispatch from Washington:

WILL CARRY OUT DOMINGO PLAN—PRESIDENT DECIDES TO ENFORCE TERMS OF UNRATIFIED AGREEMENT—TO HOLD REVENUES HERE—FIFTY-FIVE PER CENT OF CUSTOMS WILL BE KEPT UNTIL SENATE ACTS—ROOSEVELT DIRECTS MINISTER DAWSON TO ACCEDE TO DOMINICAN PROPOSAL FOR A TEMPORARY RECEIVERSHIP—CREDITORS HAVE AGREED TO TAKE NO STEPS UNTIL SENATE HAS REACHED ITS DECISION—PRESIDENT EXPLAINS THAT HE IS ONLY MAINTAINING STATUS QUO—ADEE ADDS THAT IT IS SANTO DOMINGO'S SCHEME, NOT OURS, AND THAT WE ARE ONLY EXTENDING FRIENDLY AID TO A NEIGHBOR.

WASHINGTON, March 28, 1905.

President Roosevelt gave orders to-day which provide that the United States Government shall act as the temporary conditional receiver of Santo Domingo's finances. Nominally the Dominican Government is to create the receivership, but its agents in the transaction are to be American citizens, named by the President of the United States, and the revenues collected by them at Santo Domingo custom-houses are to be sequestrated in a New York bank pending final action by the United States Senate on the treaty between the American and the Dominican Governments.

The treaty can not be taken up until the Congress assembles in extra session next October. In the meantime the terms of that unratified agreement will be carried out as if it were in force, with the exception that the Dominican revenues will not be distributed to Santo Domingo's foreign creditors unless and until the Senate gives its sanction.

The President's determination in this important matter was reached to-day as a result of further important conferences with his Cabinet and with Senators LODGE and SPOONER. The official explanation of the reasons for Mr. Roosevelt's course, made by the President himself, is that Santo Domingo had earnestly called for aid and that it was the duty of the United States, the only government able to do so, to respond to that call. In the order issued on the subject, which is addressed to Acting Secretary of State Adee, the President outlined the receivership scheme and told why he regarded it as necessary for the United States to assume charge of Santo Domingo's revenues at this time. The order follows:

THE PRESIDENT'S EXPLANATION.

WHITE HOUSE,
Washington, March 28, 1905.

To the ACTING SECRETARY OF STATE:

I have carefully considered the following telegram from Minister Dawson:

"SECRETARY OF STATE, Washington:

"Under pressure foreign creditors and domestic peril Dominican Government offers to nominate a citizen of the United States receiver southern ports pending ratification protocol, four northern ports to be administered under the award. Forty-five per cent total shall go to the Dominican Government, fifty-five to be deposited in New York for distribution after ratification. Creditors to agree to take no further steps in the meantime and receiver to have full authority to suspend importers' preferential contracts. Italian, Spanish, German, and American creditors, except the Improvement (company), accept unconditionally. Belgian, French representatives will recommend acceptance. Some modus vivendi absolutely necessary. I am ready, if desired, to start for Washington, D. C., 28th, to explain details and modifications of plan obtainable; the whole matter can be held open during my absence.

"DAWSON."

I direct that the minister express acquiescence in the proposal of the Government of Santo Domingo for the collection and conservation of its revenues pending the action of the United States Senate upon the treaty to the end that in the meantime no change shall take place in the situation which would render useless its consummation or bring complications into its enforcement.

The Secretary of War of the United States will present for nomination by the President of the Dominican Republic men to act in the position referred to in both the northern and southern ports. The utmost care will of course be taken to choose men of capacity and absolute integrity who, if possible, shall have some knowledge of Spanish. All the moneys collected from both the northern and southern ports not turned over to the Dominican Government will be deposited in some New York bank, to be designated by the Secretary of War, and will there be kept until the Senate has acted.

If the action is adverse, the money will then be turned over to the Dominican Government. If it is favorable, it will be distributed among the creditors in proportion to their just claims under the treaty. Meanwhile, Mr. Hollender will thoroughly investigate these claims, including the claim of the American Improvement Company, and will report in detail all the information he is able to gather as to the amount actually received by Santo Domingo, the amount of indebtedness nominally incurred, the circumstances, so far as they are known, under which the various debts were incurred, and so forth.

This action is rendered necessary by the peculiar circumstances of the case. The treaty now before the Senate was concluded with Santo Domingo at Santo Domingo's earnest request, repeatedly pressed upon us, and was submitted to the Senate because in my judgment it was our duty to our less fortunate neighbor to respond to her call for aid, inasmuch as we were the only power who could give this aid, and inasmuch as her need for it was very great.

The treaty is now before the Senate, and has been favorably reported by the Committee on Foreign Relations. It is pending, and final action will undoubtedly be taken when Congress convenes next fall. Meanwhile, Santo Domingo has requested that the action above outlined be taken; that is, she desires in this way to maintain the status quo, so that if the treaty is ratified it can be executed.

With this purpose in view, I direct that the proposed arrangement be approved. It will terminate as soon as the Senate has acted one way or the other.

THEODORE ROOSEVELT.

SANTO DOMINGO'S PLAN, NOT OURS.

Acting Secretary Adee made a statement also, in which he went a little further than the President, in explaining the circumstances that had brought about the acceptance by this Government of the Dominican Republic's proposal.

Mr. Adee maintained that the arrangement with Santo Domingo constituted a modus vivendi to be executed by that Government and not by the United States. He held, in addition, that the new scheme was merely an extension of the arbitral award under which the United States Government is collecting revenues at two Dominican ports and applying them to liquidating the claim of the San Domingo Improvement Company of New York. It was asserted also by Mr. Adee that the pending Dominican treaty "is not our treaty," but Santo Domingo's, and that the receivership plan was merely intended to preserve the status quo so that "if the treaty be ratified it can be executed."

ASSISTANT SECRETARY ADEE'S VERSION.

Here is Mr. Adee's explanation:

The Dominican Government, being pressed by foreign creditors and being threatened by considerable dangers within, has endeavored to find some method by which it can tide over its difficulties until the fate of the treaty before the Senate can be determined at the next session. With that purpose in view the Dominican Government has proposed that it shall for itself adopt to other ports in Santo Domingo a procedure similar to that which has already been put in operation in the northern ports of Santo Domingo under the award of last year.

To that end Santo Domingo proposes to nominate some citizen of the United States as a receiver of customs for the southern ports, who will pay a percentage of the total receipts to the Dominican Government and will deposit the remainder in New York, subject to disposal after the Senate shall have acted upon the pending treaty. The various creditor nations have either agreed or are favorably disposed to agree to take no further steps in the meantime.

This proposal of Santo Domingo constitutes a modus vivendi to tide over the situation until the Senate shall act, but it is a modus vivendi to be executed by Santo Domingo, requiring only the acquiescence of the United States and its good offices to propose to the creditors of Santo Domingo for such collections.

The Government of the United States will assent to this arrangement and will nominate men of capacity and integrity to take charge of these custom-houses, they, of course, acting as the agents of Santo Domingo, under appointment by the Dominican Government.

TO HOLD REVENUE UNTIL SENATE ACTS.

The percentage of moneys due to the creditors will be deposited in some New York bank and will be kept there until the Senate shall have acted. If the action is adverse the money will be returned to the Dominican Government. If the Senate's action be favorable the money will be distributed among the creditors in proportion to their just treaty claims.

It is to be borne in mind that the obligations which it is proposed to settle in this way are based on an arbitral award substantially like our own. That arrangement does not cover any adjudication of unawarded claims. It relates to established obligations.

Action of this character appears to be imposed upon the Dominican Government by the peculiar circumstances of the case and to receive the good offices of the United States within the proper limits.

The treaty with Santo Domingo now before the Senate was concluded in response to such a call from Santo Domingo herself. It was not our treaty. We endeavored to help Santo Domingo to respond to obligations which she herself recognized and was desirous to meet. And we were the only power which could give Santo Domingo the aid she needed, and needed very quickly.

That treaty has not been rejected by the Senate. On the contrary, it is still before the Senate, and as a continuing treaty, having been favorably reported by the Committee on Foreign Relations with some amendments which touch no vital point, it is still pending, and final action will undoubtedly be taken when Congress convenes next fall. In the meantime the present proposal of Santo Domingo has for its object to maintain the status quo, so that if the treaty be ratified it can be executed.

LODGE AND SPOONER GIVE IN.

Senators LODGE and SPOONER, who had yesterday foreseen objection to the arrangement proposed through Minister Dawson, but who asked for further time to consider the matter, practically acquiesced to-day in the President's view that the conditions in Santo Domingo made the action which he later ordered the only thing to be done in the present circumstances. The President also received encouragement from Senators FORAKER and KNOX. Mr. FORAKER, like Mr. LODGE and Mr. SPOONER, is a member of the Committee on Foreign Relations. The President's action is bound to cause a renewal of criticism of his Dominican policy when the Senate reassembles. Senator MORGAN of Alabama, ranking Democratic member of the Foreign Relations Committee and the leading opponent of the pending Dominican treaty, declared to-night that the President's course was unconstitutional, that it established a protectorate over Santo Domingo, and that it was merely an application of the original protocol which the Senate had declined to sanction. This view will undoubtedly be taken by the Democrats, who were practically unanimous in opposition to the pending treaty.

By his action to-day the President puts in force, to all intents and purposes, the terms of the Dillingham-Sanchez protocol of January 20, 1905, which the Government declined to sanction. Subsequently a treaty was negotiated along the lines of the Dillingham-Sanchez agreement and was submitted to the Senate. This arrangement was severely criticised in the Senate, and the opposition to some of its provisions was not confined to Democratic Senators. Mr. SPOONER was one of its most severe critics.

The opposition was so general in the Committee on Foreign Relations that several amendments were made, but even this did not satisfy the objections of many Senators, who made such a determined fight against ratification that those in charge of the treaty were afraid to let it come to a vote. This treaty is now pending, and will be taken up again when Congress meets in extra session next fall.

It is maintained that although the new arrangement, the so-called "modus vivendi," does not permit the United States Government to act as disbursing agent in the payment of the Dominican Republic's foreign obligations, it puts upon the Government practically all the responsibility it would assume under the rejected Dillingham-Sanchez protocol and the subsequent treaty now pending, and to that extent is in direct violation of the principles laid down by the Senate.

MR. ADEE'S VIEWS CRITICISED.

Considerable comment has been caused by Acting Secretary Adee's statement that the action taken to-day is to maintain the status quo in Santo Domingo. In some quarters this is taken to mean that the United States Government will prevent any political change in Santo Domingo while the temporary arrangement is in force, thus creating the obligations of suzerainty to which there was such strenuous objection in the Senate.

A more serious objection, to which attention is called, is that through preventing action on the treaty, Senators who support the Administration will be able to keep the modus vivendi in force indefinitely. It is true that no money can be paid to Santo Domingo's creditors until the pending treaty has been ratified, but the fact remains, it is contended, that the United States Government will be exercising a virtual supervision over Dominican finances without the necessary compliance with the provisions of the Constitution as brought out in the Senate debates.

The Executive order, as I have stated, is dated March 28, 1905. I have here its complement in the order at the other end of the cable in Santo Domingo; that is the modus vivendi, as we call it. Some of you Senators who are members of the Committee on Foreign Relations and who have studied that question in international law, will enlighten me if my interpretation of the phrase is wrong—this temporary arrangement, as we call it. I know the Latin means a method of living. I suppose it is just a kind of a little rope by which to hang on to life until you get loose or are completely hung, one or the other. [Laughter.]

Santo Domingo, through its President, so-called, Carlos F. Morales, issued this pronunciamento. This was in April, mind you, some three or four days after the President's order here had gone into effect, and the question now is—I have seen it stated in the newspapers; I do not know upon what foundation, but these fellows in the gallery and hanging around Washington are the shrewdest lot of gentlemen that I have ever come across, and what they do not know about public men and public matters is not worth knowing; I assure you of that—I have seen it stated in the papers that the course of this Government in Santo Domingo was coercive; that Morales and his little junta, or whatever you may call it, of cutthroats, as I shall proceed to describe them presently—this so-called "Government" down there was compelled to accept, by Mr. Dawson's persuasive eloquence, backed up by a gunboat or two, or the threat of them, in order to cure the defects in the legal status internationally—that he was compelled to issue that pronunciamento, which, in effect, is merely a reproduction in terms of the President's order. I will not take the trouble to read it, but will simply incorporate it in my remarks, unless some Senator may want to hear it. Its authenticity may be doubted, but it is said by the Washington Post to be a translation of the original.

Several SENATORS. Read it.

Mr. TILLMAN. Some Senators ask me to read it, and I will do so. It is as follows:

TRANSLATION OF MODUS.

What has been called the modus vivendi has been in existence since last April, but until now it has never been translated into English. The Post this morning presents a translation which is used at the State Department. It is as follows:

"CARLOS F. MORALES, L.,
"Constitutional President of the Republic:

"With a view to protecting all the creditors of the Republic, until the Dominican Congress and the Senate of the United States shall take action in regard to the convention, signed on the 7th of February of the current year by the representatives of the Governments of the Dominican Republic and the United States, providing that the said convention should be latent meanwhile, and to facilitate its complete execution if it should be ratified or not to prejudice any rights if it should fail of confirmation.

"The opinion of the council of secretaries of state having been heard:

"Be it resolved—1. To appoint a person to receive the revenues of all the customs of the Republic, and for the greater security of the creditors of the latter it is left to the President of the United States to designate the person who shall receive the said revenues, and the Dominican executive shall confer the office on the said person, provided always that the designation made is satisfactory to the said executive.

"2. The money collected shall be distributed in the following manner: (a) Forty-five per cent to meet the expenses of the budget, (b) the necessary expenses of collecting, including the salaries of all the customs employees.

"3. The residue, being the amount to be devoted to the payment of the debts, shall be immediately deposited in some New York bank to be designated by the President of the United States, to remain in deposit for the benefit of all the creditors of the Republic, both Dominican and foreign, and shall not be drawn out until the Dominican Congress and the Senate of the United States shall have taken action in regard to the pending convention.

"4. If the final determination of the Congress of the Dominican Republic and the Senate of the United States shall be favorable to the pending convention, the moneys deposited shall be distributed among the creditors, in proportion to their just credits, in accordance with the terms of the said convention. If the determination of the aforesaid Congress and Senate should be averse, the said moneys shall be at the disposition of the Dominican Government for equitable distribution among the creditors, in accordance with the terms of such agreement as it shall make with them.

"5. With a view to carrying out the above provisions the executive authority suspends all payments on the debts of the Republic, of whatsoever character that may be, during the time this modus vivendi shall be in force. No document shall be received in payment of customs and port duties, and the total amount of all the revenues payable through the customs shall be turned in to the receiver referred to in this resolution.

"6. This modus vivendi is not to be taken as indicating any intention to interfere with or alter the substantial rights of creditors nor to repudiate or modify any of the agreements heretofore made by the Government, except in so far as the immediate execution of such rights and agreements is suspended by the general deferment hereby declared.

"7. This modus vivendi shall go into effect from the 1st of April of the current year.

"Given at the national palace of Santo Domingo, capital of the Republic, on the 31st day of March, in the sixty-second year of the independence and the forty-second year of the restoration.

"MORALES, L.

"Attested: The minister of the treasury and commerce:
"FERDERICO VALASQUEZ, H."

Now, Mr. President, it seems to be undisputed that the present arrangement in Santo Domingo is of a character practically described in the message of the President. It constitutes the United States as receiver, with an officer of the Army, Colonel Colton, detailed by War Department orders to go there to receive these moneys and superintend the collection, while the fleet of the United States, or enough of it to serve the purpose, has been practically blockading the island, with the result that under this new and strong and forcible administration 45 per cent of the customs dues collectible on imports in that Republic now exceed the whole amount under the old régime. In other words, the blockade of United States gunboats is so efficacious that 45 per cent now is more than the entire customs receipts prior to the intervention of the United States in behalf of Santo Domingo's creditors.

The question naturally presents itself here as to who is most interested in the payment of these claims. The eloquent Senator from Maryland [Mr. RAYNER] gave us a brief résumé the other day from some publication of the English bondholders, in which the startling statement was made that for a loan of seven hundred and fifty-odd thousand pounds, for which the Government bonds of Santo Domingo were issued, the total sum of cash, after deducting commissions and other et ceteras which were seized in transit by the shylocks and sharks—I have not got the eloquent phraseology of the Senator from Maryland to describe those fellows who live by cent per cent in shaving paper, buying up bonds, and making hard bargains with people who are in desperate straits—it was shown by an official publication, not of the Government, but of this bondholding syndicate, that the Dominican people, the Republic and Government thereof, received all told only £38,000, for which they have a debt of £750,000 outstanding. The Senator from Maryland went on to show also that Dominican bonds had gone up in price, and that all South American securities were enhanced in value by reason of the beneficient policy of this Government in instituting receiverships and becoming debt collector.

The question suggests itself to my mind whether or not any person connected officially with the Government of the United States owns any of those securities.

The microbe of graft or stealing seems to be equal in its inroads upon the human family nowadays to the microbe of la grippe, or, rather, it seems to be that it does not leave as many untouched as la grippe did a few years ago, when the epidemic came here. I have no evidence at all. I do not know about it at all, but I am forced to surmise that there is an awful lot of anxiety somewhere, and there has been an immense amount of drastic power of some kind, persuasive and coercive, to drive somebody to do something to make this debt collectible and to get the United States Government behind it.

You can see for yourselves on a moment's consideration how easy and nice a speculation it would be to have purchased some bonds of Santo Domingo, that were discredited in the markets of the world last year, at 2 or 3 cents on the dollar, and get up a modus vivendi, or some other Latin phrase which signifies interference with your neighbor's affairs, forcing him to establish a "just and orderly" government and compel him to be decent for a while until you get your little money paid, and put a handsome profit in your pocket, and then go on about your business. In ordinary parlance you would be considered a very smart fellow, who had performed a sharp trick in finance. I only say, just by way of suggestion, that this thing is barely possible. I would feel fearfully mortified if it should be shown that it is the true status. But just leaving that as a little hint thrown out, I pass on to discuss another phase of the question and to put in some more exhibits as to the kind of people with whom we are dealing.

We have in Santo Domingo now something which may be called "the residuary legatee of Mr. Morales's Republic." What sort of Government it is can be best shown by quoting from another very responsible paper, which is very careful in its news service and wants to be clean and honest always, the Springfield Republican. I give you here a recent statement from the Washington correspondent to the Springfield Republican:

There are a number of men here in Washington whose work, diplomatic or otherwise, has taken them to Santo Domingo in times past, and who are able to give an account of Morales from a more or less extended acquaintance with him there in the island. Morales has also spent some years of his life in this country, but knowledge of him as seen here is naturally less important than as seen in his Santo Domingo environment.

Carlos F. Morales is of Spanish-African descent. He is almost white, showing little trace of his African blood except in his kinky hair, and is prepossessing in appearance. He speaks English and French in addition to Spanish, and is fairly well educated. He was educated, in fact, for the priesthood, but his youth was wild even after he became a priest. He was vain of his influence over women, and rejoiced in the reputation of being a Don Juan. He is described as fond of fighting, treacherous, and merciless. Troublesome enemies he dispatched with a readiness that earned him the name of "the butcher priest." In this item of the art of statesmanship he appears to have patterned himself upon Ulisse Heureaux a former president of Santo Domingo, whose bloody crimes were at one time title to a wide fame.

Heureaux was said to be a full-blooded negro and was one of the most notable human monsters that the prolific West Indies ever produced. He became President of Santo Domingo in 1884. His orgies and his crimes were the talk of all the Antilles. He was as much a Nero and a Caligula as the resources of Santo Domingo would permit. He raised money by issuing bonds for which he received 5 or 10 cents on the dollar, the people of Santo Domingo being saddled with the successive issues. He looted the customs revenues, got all the money he could by granting concessions to speculators, and tried to raise more by issuing worthless paper money. He was charged in all with some 2,000 murders. A list of his alleged victims was once printed and filled several columns. One of these victims was Ramon Caceres. This man's son, Ramon Caceres, jr., finally killed Heureaux in 1899. It is this Ramon Caceres, jr., who is now president of Santo Domingo since Morales has been deposed.

There are at present two parties in Santo Domingo which are struggling for the supremacy. They are known as the Horacistas and the Jimenistas. For the time being the Horacistas are triumphant, and Ramon Caceres, their head, acts as President, while Morales, the deposed President, is supposed to be making his way to join the Jimenistas, and lead them in revolt. The histories of the parties are brief and interesting.

In 1889 Juan Isidro Jiminez, one of the most ingenious of Santo Domingo's large crop of revolutionists, succeeded Ulises Heureux as President. Horacio Vasquez became Vice-President. Vasquez is now an old man, a pretty decent one, considering his environment, and is the father-in-law of Ramon Caceres, the new President. Jiminez was in office a year and took over the custom-houses from foreign administrators in whose hands Heureux had placed them. Jiminez objected to the exorbitant demands of those who had lent money to Heureux, and endeavored to have their claims examined. Vasquez became disaffected, and on a quiet night deposed Jiminez and assumed the Presidency himself. Jiminez, to save his life, took to the woods exactly as Morales has done now. It was in this way that the two parties got their names, the Jimenistas being the followers of Jiminez, the Horacistas being the followers of Horacio Vasquez.

Vasquez had the usual brief term of office. He tried, according to accounts, to administer the affairs of the country with some small degree of honesty. But it was difficult for him to secure complete returns from the custom-houses. One by one these slipped from his control, and one fine morning there was a new President, who rejoiced in the name of Alejandro Wos y Gil.

The lot of Wos y Gil was no better than that of his predecessor. He promptly repudiated all Vasquez's plans to adjudicate and settle the foreign debts. He suspected the United States of having designs on Samana Bay, and in order to head off this country he endeavored to convey certain harbors to Germany. But meanwhile ex-President Jiminez was in New York organizing another revolution, in which several Americans were mixed up. Among Jiminez's captains was the young priest, Carlos F. Morales. In the end Morales had the fortune to lead a body of ragged and starving Jiministas into San Domingo. Morales had at his command the largest rabble—it would scarcely be accurate to call them soldiers—Jiminez was not on the spot to oppose him, and Vasquez was old and feeble. So the young priest listened to the call of his "manifest destiny" and had himself proclaimed president.

Jiminez was naturally surprised when he learned how he had been tricked, and promptly saw that the only thing to do was to start another revolution, this time against Morales. So Jiminez started one revolution and the Horacistas started another. That made it easier for Morales. By placing leading men of both parties in office he managed to play them off, one against another. He made Ramon Caceres, of the Horacistas, vice-president, and General Rodriguez, a leading Jimenista, governor of Monte Christi.

As the subsequent proceedings are now read, it appears that as the time approached for another revolution the astute Morales looked about him for some new scheme for continuing himself in office. It was on this account that he concocted the plan of inducing the United States to act as administrator of the custom-houses.

He shrewdly calculated that with Americans in control and paying him 45 per cent of the customs honestly collected, and with American war ships at every port to suppress uprisings, he would be protected from his enemies, get actually more money than he could otherwise, and have an excellent chance of finally getting all the customs-houses under improved conditions. It was this brilliant proposition, though hardly couched in these terms, that won for Morales from President Roosevelt characteristic praise for being a "prudent and farsighted statesman."

Minister Dawson was completely drawn into the scheme, and through him the Administration was drawn in also. For a while all went well, at least from the Morales standpoint. According to Mr. Roosevelt's message to Congress, Morales received more from the 45 per cent of the customs, collected and turned over to him by American officials, than he had previously been getting from the total collected under Dominican officials. Further than this, Morales was encouraged in the hope that the United States Senate would ratify the treaty confirming this arrangement. This would practically have insured him immunity from revolution or foreign intervention for ten years.

But apparently the Horacistas and Jimenistas again grew busy in a revolutionary way. The war ships of the United States could prevent the custom-houses being seized by revolutionists, but they could not prevent internal plots, which made Morales fear that he might have a knife stuck in his back quite as adroitly as he had himself stuck knives in the backs of others. Apparently when he saw things were coming to a crisis he chose the part of discretion and took to the bush. He has been making his way, it has been supposed, toward Monte Christi, there to join General Rodriguez and the Jimenistas. Meanwhile Ramon Caceres, son-in-law, of Horacio Vasquez, has been made, or has made himself, president, and the Horacistas are on top.

Now, that is an admirable picture, no doubt entirely correct, of what kind of a government our great and good President has taken under his wing. We have entered upon a policy of dealing with assassins, cutthroats, robbers, murderers, libertines, everything that the English language can give you in the way of debauchery, degradation, beastly, and brutal.

I hope I will be permitted by the Senator from Massachusetts, and I will ask now at least to amend my resolution, even if he is going to take it under his fostering care and deposit it safely and quietly in a little grave in the room of his Committee on Foreign Relations, by a vote of the Senate. I should like to amend it by asking somebody to tell us how much has been expended. I suppose we can approximately guess, because 55 per cent yielded $1,000,000 in ten months, and 45 per cent will yield a proportionate amount, or something like $800,000 or $850,000. So I would like to know what kind of a government this $850,000 has been expended in carrying on.

I have recently talked with a gentleman who has a place of business in New York and who has a large sugar plantation in Santo Domingo, and I have gotten some inside information from a man on the ground as to conditions. I was told that when the time came for the Senate to act or not act, and the $1,000,000 in the bank was held up to the view of this greedy coterie of cutthroats—I will call them—or back-stickers—if other people like that better—when the Senate, if it rejected this convention, might possibly see our President obey the laws and Constitution and withdraw it and turn this money over, though it is not at all certain. He is a strenuous man, fond of his own way. He has transgressed the canons of a century in dealing with the Senate as an Executive by carrying into effect a treaty that we refused to ratify. It used to be permissible for the Senate to indicate its disallowance or unwillingness to do a thing, and it ended it. But we have got to say "No," and say it in loud words, to Theodore Roosevelt, or he will not hear it at all. [Laughter and manifestations of applause in the galleries.]

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Applause is not allowed in the galleries.

Mr. TILLMAN. But as I started to say, here is a million dollars. So everything beyond that amount has been already used or squandered or laid away as a nest egg, because if I was down there as a president in that glorious government of law and order, which our gunboats have been sustaining, I certainly would be laying up a nest egg to carry off in my grip when I ran away. When I took to the woods I should like something to eat, or something to buy something to eat with, rather than to be in the pitiable plight that Morales is in now. But we have been cherishing this delightful acquaintance and protégé of ours. He has been taken away from Santo Domingo, where knives are flying in the air, or some one is ready to stab his brother under the fifth rib, and has been put on one of our gunboats and carried to Porto Rico, and I suppose is now an applicant for a position on the Panama Canal. Would not that be glorious for this great Republic, to thus use its supply of fugitive ex-presidents?

We have found Mr. Morales. I want to ask somebody—perhaps the telephone might be used in an emergency, though I am not in a hurry—to tell us whether or not the money in bank is to go back to the Dominican Government, regardless of its personnel or its character of orderliness and honesty, or whether the Santo Domingo Improvement Company can come in as the preferred creditor, under some award made two or three years ago, I think, by Mr. Day, Mr. Carlisle, and a man named Galvan.

I am a little curious to know what is going to become of this million dollars in the event the Senate does not see fit to ratify this convention. But that is neither here nor there. I am only alluding to it now as the golden apple held up to the view of Caceres and Vasquez and his other coadjutors now in power or in possession of the Government as the thing which made it desirable and entirely proper for them to notify Morales, "Vamose! or we will cut your throat as you have cut other throats."

But what is the purpose of the United States and its great and good Executive? Are we in association in an orderly and dignified way with that class of people claiming to be a government? When you find that it is not a government, according to our canons, our ideas of government, but is simply a little despotism, sustained by a few ragamuffins with muskets, who are called the "army," is it our purpose as a people to enter upon this untried plan of endeavoring to coerce people who are incapable of self-government, who have demonstrated it by a century of effort and failure to erect some form of government with which an honest man will care to deal?

Consider for a moment the situation which has existed almost time out of mind from the Rio Grande to Patagonia. Mexico at this time, and for the last twenty-five or thirty years, has had a good government, but what kind of a government is it? Whatever may be its status now, while I think probably all the forms of law and order are preserved and its Congress is elected, and those people have been educated along the lines of imitating the United States until they have to-day certainly the best representative government of Spanish-Americans on this continent, what was it when Diaz took hold of it, and how did Diaz take it? He took it as a military leader, by force, and he has held it until he has demonstrated his capacity for orderly government and constructive statesmanship. He has won the admiration, not only of his own people, but of the world, and is to-day an example of statesmanship equaled on this continent by few people and hardly surpassed in Europe at the present day or in the past half century by any man other than Bismarck.

But here you have it. These people, especially when they are mixed much with the aborigines—the original Indians—or with the negroes, have a condition of chronic disorder internally, one military leader rising to put down another, insurrection against any form of orderly government, a disposition nowhere to submit to the rule of the majority, an absolute disability to comprehend the meaning of self-government. And yet it is going to be our business to say to all Europe, "No matter what class of ruffians or scoundrels or thieves or cutthroats your citizens have to deal with, you must permit us to become receivers; you must permit us to set up a court and try the causes and to determine the amount, the validity, and justice of all claims; then let us collect the revenues of those governments and set about disbursing them and go along that line for the purpose, as our great President says, of helping our weaker brethren."

My God! it seems to me we have enough troubles right here at home. We have got them right here in our own borders pressing for solution, conditions of unrest which only await a shrinkage in the volume of business, the ability to give employment, and then some panic will start. One will come some time or other. God forbid it should come in my day, because I have seen two and I do not want to see any more. But just let something happen here to disturb the business conditions and put millions of men out of employment with hungry stomachs and we will certainly have enough trouble right here to occupy us.

As the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE] said the other day, instead of devoting our attention as legislators to better our condition here, to grant relief where it is needed, to pass laws that are demanded for the reformation of our home affairs, we quit all these to rush off and engage in this Quixotic enterprise of civilizing a people.

No, I do not know that anybody pretends that we intend to civilize them; but, to use the language of the President, to see that our weaker brethren have a just and orderly government.

How many people are down that way who are constitutionally incapable of comprehending what an orderly and just government is? I have not taken the trouble recently to look at the statistics of South American population. Take out Chile, Brazil, and Mexico. Just now there is a kind of dead calm down there; there are only one or two revolutions going on in one or two of the republics; but nobody knows when a new one will start up.

What business is it of ours to go there meddling with those people? The Monroe doctrine demands of us, and by that doctrine I stand, that we will say to all Europe, "Deal with these people, when they injure your citizens, as you see fit, but do not you dare undertake to set up any government over them of your own; do not you dare undertake to seize an inch of land." That is the Monroe doctrine. But suppose, as an illustration, we endeavored or desired to help these people. Suppose, in the interest of commerce and good-fellowship and friendly relation—for commerce will never go where friendship does not precede it—we should say to these South American people, "Many of your countries are in debt, you have had to strike hard bargains, or you have had bad governments that have issued bonds recklessly; you owe a great many people, and it is probable that by some compromise arrangement the creditors who are now largely dependent upon your will to pay them might agree to a modus vivendi, to use the diplomatic phrase, by which things could be bettered."

Suppose we were to invite all the South American and Central American peoples to meet us in Washington with their delegates, and suppose by common consent of those peoples it is agreed among ourselves as Americans, North and South, charged specifically with preserving the status quo as far as governmental affairs go on this continent, that we will enter into an agreement with each other by which the United States will exercise its good offices in their behalf to bring about an arbitration of all these things, and that they will then unite in a proposition with us to exercise police jurisdiction and, if necessary, control the custom-houses to the extent that we will see them out of debt by such means as will allow their Governments to live pending the settlement. Suppose we were to demonstrate actual friendship rather than pretended friendship, does anyone dare assume that those people would not feel grateful to us, and would not jump at the opportunity to have our help, to stand by and say to the European creditor or to the United States creditor, "Here, you struck a hard bargain; you have been dealing with people who are not honest, who are unclean, and the citizens of these republics are to bear the burden of settlement; but let us settle upon some equitable and honest basis after an investigation into your claim."

I could see wherein a President who would advise that and carry it out would be called "blessed" by the people south of us. But through this big-stick policy, through this receivership policy, through this dealing with de facto governments of whatever character, however dirty and barbarous and brutal may be the officers who for the time have the matter in control, threatened, as they are daily, by another revolution, so that we would have to say, "Well, here, whatever may be the situation, we deal with the government in possession." That is what we would have to do unless we agreed to maintain the government with which we dealt.

Mr. Morales undoubtedly thought that he would have the benefit of the ratification of the treaty; that he and his fellows would get the million dollars in New York if the treaty were not ratified and that by reason of the friendship of the United States there would come to him an era of peace and plenty, ratification or no ratification. But the other fellows thought they would rather have the enjoyment of that before the treaty was ratified, so they said to him, "Get out! or we will cut your throat," and he got out.

Now, who knows how soon the man in charge, Caceres, will be told by Vasquez, or some other leader down there, "Get out, or we will cut your throat." What is the present status in Santo Domingo, except that the United States practically has control of the island and intends to hold it, and who doubts President Roosevelt will hold it unless the Senate, as I said, says "No" with a capital N?

But what do we hear next? I saw a statement in the Washington Post and in the Evening Star, both of which try to be fair and clean in their news service, friendly, I think, with the President when he will let them be. Anyhow, it is not worth while to read it. I will just quote those two papers. You have all read it. It is a statement undoubtedly authorized at the White House, which says that if the Senate shall thwart the President in his various policies, including Santo Domingo, starting with Santo Domingo first and going on to the others, resort will be had to a joint resolution. Our great and good President, so intent upon doing good in his own way, regardless of consequences, I suppose has intimated to his lieutenants and friends—certainly he wants them to understand he has it in mind—that if he can not have a treaty according to the Constitution of his country he will have a joint resolution passed by his subservient friends and followers in the two branches.

What can a joint resolution do other than annex? It certainly can not formulate any treaty that would be the law of the land under the Constitution. So we have a shadow of the annexation of this delightful protégé of the President, governed by these orderly and wise statesmen like Morales and Caceres and Jiminez and Rodrigues. No; Rodrigues has got his knife or his bullet; he is gone; but anyhow that is the class. We have the prospect, the delightful prospect, of having this island with its couple of millions population, mostly negroes, for Haiti has practically all negroes, Santo Domingo has four-fifths negroes and mixed bloods—I say we have the prospect of our lord and master the President being so much in love with having his own way to pay certain debts according to his own desire that we will have the Senate ordered to pass a joint resolution annexing this island.

And the House, which gave an exhibition yesterday of its disability or inability to resist Executive policy, the House, which a witty and eloquent correspondent of the Boston Herald described a few days back as puppets, the clanking of whose chains are heard as they dance, is expected to pass such a joint resolution in case the rebellious Senate will not give way and ratify the treaty. And the Senate by a majority vote will do the same. The Republican party is supposed to belong body and soul to the President, and will not say nay to any of his wishes.

But it is argued in this newspaper that it is necessary to have four more votes in order to get the two-thirds required by the Constitution to ratify this convention. To obtain those I suppose efforts are now on foot, actively canvassing and looking about for "White House Democrats" who might for some little mess of pottage or other consideration—that is it, a pound or two of pork or something like that—be induced to fall in behind the, I do not want to say servile, but it would in my judgment be a servile Senate on that side if unanimously they agreed with this programme. But that is the programme as outlined by the press, and coming I do not doubt authoritatively from Theodore Roosevelt's own lips. Now, you have got the whole scheme.

Well, what are we going to do about it? I have heard it said that the purpose of delay in the present innocuous desuetude that obtains in the Committee on Foreign Relations in regard to this convention was due to the fact that by maintaining the status quo the President would continue, and feel authorized to continue, his present policy in Santo Domingo, and that, therefore, we are not likely to have a vote on the treaty for some months to come, if at all.

Probably we will adjourn again without any action. Of course, our Cæsar would then feel authorized to say, "Why, the Senate has not said to me, 'No;' it knew all the status; it has not indicated that it opposed it or disagreed with it. So I will go on in my beneficent care and friendly offices to my warm friend, the successor of Morales, Mr. Caceres," to say nothing of the creditors who naturally are very anxious for somebody to collect the money to pay their debts, just and unjust; to say nothing of the men hid out in bushes, if such there be, who have bought Dominican securities at 2 or 3 or 5 cents on the dollar, and can well afford to make any kind of a compromise, and in a generous compromise would take 50 cents on the dollar, or even 25 cents.

Well, what are we going to do about it? Are we going to vote on this treaty in the near future? Will some one on the other side who is authorized to speak tell us? Let us understand whether you have got your four White House Democrats ready or whether all of you Republicans are lined up and willing to go on record as voting for this departure in our foreign relations, this establishment of a receiver, this establishment of a court of equity, or some other kind of a court, to marshal the assets and apportion the money among the creditors.

We have got a large navy, and it seems to me that it is just now not doing very much. We do not need any more ships down there, but we may need to send a few more gunboats or torpedo boats to help keep down smuggling. We could even engage in this same delectable occupation with two or three other South American peoples and countries, and unless there might be some little row kicked up on shore or a few bullets shot nobody would be very seriously concerned, I presume, with this.

But, my brother Senators, have we reached that pass in the first hundred and twenty-five years of our national existence that this great coordinate branch of the Government, charged specifically under the Constitution to assist the President in negotiating and ratifying treaties—have we sunk so low, are we so oblivious of our obligations to our oaths of office and the people we represent and the States we represent, that we will present the spectacle here that the great men on the other side of this Chamber, who are the leaders and the responsible men for this thing, are afraid to stand up in your seats and say to Mr. Roosevelt: "You have got to obey the law or we will take you by the throat, sir?" Or is the possession of power so dear, so sweet, and the dispensing of patronage so necessary to your official existence that you will present the spectacle of having yourselves hectored and threatened?

Why, listen. What happened two or three days ago? A hint, an insinuation went out that the "rebels," as they were called in the House, men who were opposing the Philippine tariff, had gotten up some kind of arrangement by which they were to defeat the tariff unless some amendment were made to the statehood bill. The insinuation goes out that these men have been bought, that money had been used among them. The Senate before the country to-day stands disgraced in the eyes of the people because of the use of the press of the country to flyblow it as an instrument of corporations and wealth, and the President is pressing onward along his collateral lines in various schemes of his own, among them rate legislation, which is very popular. I want some rate legislation of some kind, and I said so before he ever discovered that it was necessary. So I am not following him in that, but he is following me or following the Democratic party. But the President has not hesitated and does not hesitate now to threaten us with the wrath of our constituents on the rate-making proposition if we dare oppose him in any of his schemes. He is going to have his sweet will go through and carry out the whole programme. He is going to be Andrew Jackson, Napoleon Bonaparte, and any other fellow you can think of who pushed things to the limit.

I said the President has used the press, or it has been used by those who are his friends, to create the impression throughout the United States that the Senate to-day is obstructing him in all of his pet schemes for the public welfare, and that the country stands watching us to see how far we dare go in the maintenance of our constitutional rights and prerogatives. The people are oblivious of the enormity and outrage of his conduct in the Santo Domingo business because of their earnest desire to see other things done.

I have taken some trouble to examine and find out all I can in regard to Theodore Roosevelt's attitude toward his predecessors. I will quote verbatim and literatim from his own books on Thomas H. Benton and Gouverneur Morris.

I have already remarked that the President seems to have had no respect for anything old, anything uttered or done by any of his predecessors in that great office. His own words will show what his attitude was, as I shall quote them.

Before I get to talking about the newspapers, I want to ask what is the matter with our Chief Executive? What motive actuates him? What is there underlying his conduct? Why is he so much in love with his own way? Why does he turn his back on the advice and statemanship and the canons of conduct of this Government for the last hundred years? Why does he think himself so much superior to all his predecessors?

My purpose in looking this up was to call attention to some of the peculiar characteristics of the present occupant of the White House and give his estimate of some of the great men of the past who were his predecessors. Hear him on Jefferson:

> Jefferson could write or speak—and could feel, too—the most high-sounding sentiments; but once it came to actions he was absolutely at sea, and on almost every matter. (Gouverneur Morris, Roosevelt, p. 291.)

And this also:

> Excepting Jefferson, we have never produced an Executive more helpless than Madison when it came to grappling with real dangers and difficulties. Like his predecessor, he was only fit to be President in a time of profound peace; he was utterly out of place the instant matters grew turbulent or difficult problems arose to be solved, and he was a ridiculously incompetent leader for a war with Great Britain. (Ibid., p. 303.)

And again hear him:

> This was done mainly as an unscrupulous party move on Jefferson's part, and when his side came into power he became a firm upholder of the Union; and, being constitutionally unable to put a proper value on truthfulness, he even denied that his resolutions could be construed to favor nullification—though they could by no possibility be construed to mean anything else. (Thomas H. Benton, Roosevelt, p. 85.)

Now, this on another predecessor—two of them:

> Van Buren was the first product of what are now called "machine politics" that was put into the Presidential chair. He owed his elevation solely to his own dexterous political manipulation and to the fact that, for his own selfish ends and knowing perfectly well their folly, he had yet favored or connived at all the actions into which the Administration had been led either through Jackson's ignorance and violence or by the crafty unscrupulousness and limited knowledge of the kitchen cabinet. (Ibid., p. 163.)

Here is his fling at another:

> Tyler, however, had little else in common with Calhoun, and least of all his intellect. He has been called a mediocre man; but this is unwarranted flattery. He was a politician of monumental littleness. (Ibid., p. 212.)

And again:

> Tyler, the very smallest of the line of small Presidents who came in between Jackson and Lincoln. (Ibid., p. 259.)

And this:

> But it soon became evident that Pierce was completely under the control of the secession wing of the party, and Benton thereafterwards treated him with contemptuous hostility, despising him, and seeing him exactly as he was—a small politician of low capacity and mean surroundings, proud to act as the servile tool of men worse than himself, but also stronger and abler. (Ibid., p. 305.)

In reading I accidentally came on this:

> New York has always had a low political standard, one or the other of its great party and factional organizations, and often both or all of them, being at all times most unlovely bodies of excessively unwholesome moral tone. (Thomas H. Benton, Roosevelt, p. 73.)

This has the appearance of a bird befouling its own nest, and while it may be true, it is not known at what time Mr. Roosevelt tried to elevate the politics of his native State.

I quote this on John C. Calhoun as it caught my eye:

> Calhoun's purposes seem to have been in the main pure; but few criminals have worked as much harm to their country as he did. The plea of good intentions is not one that can be allowed to have much weight in passing historical judgment upon a man whose wrong-headedness and distorted way of looking at things produced, or helped to produce, such incalculable evil. (Ibid., p. 99.)

I would remark in passing that if the President is allowed to have his way in Latin-America the future historian will almost surely pass the same judgment on him.

To return to the press. The newspaper correspondents are the men who have made him what he is, as the public knows, because he has never had the opportunity in all his journeyings and speeches to meet more than one in a thousand of his fellow-citizens, and it is through the great instrumentality represented in that press gallery that he has become puffed up to such a degree that

> "He doth bestride the narrow world,
> Like a Colossus, and we petty men"—you, thank God, not I,
> "Walk under his huge legs and peep about
> To find ourselves dishonorable graves"—
> Or a piece of pork.

Mr. SPOONER. The Senator pointed to me.

Mr. TILLMAN. No; I have no personal controversy with the Senator from Wisconsin whatever. I will gladly welcome him into this discussion at any time he sees fit to enter.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from South Carolina yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. TILLMAN. The Senator from New Hampshire is one of the most courteous gentlemen I know of. He has been a very warm friend of mine ever since I have been here and has done me some favors.

Mr. GALLINGER. I thank the Senator. Mr. President, the Senator calls attention to threats from the White House, and that it has intimated that patronage will be withheld, and all that sort of thing, if the members of this body and of the other House of Congress do not do the will of the President. There was a direct charge made against Mr. STEENERSON, a very substantial Member of the other House, in the newspapers of the country only a few days ago, saying that the President had distinctly informed him in a conversation at the White House that had he known he was going to become one of the insurgents of that body he would not have made an appointment for him which he had made.

Now, Mr. President, if the Senator will take the RECORD of this morning he will find that Mr. STEENERSON rose to a question of personal privilege in the other House, and he declares on his honor that no such controversy ever occurred between himself and the President and that the newspaper charges were absolutely and wholly untrue.

I do not think that either this body or the other body ought to be judged by what newspaper correspondents say in reference to matters of public policy, and I think the Senator will agree with me in that statement.

Mr. TILLMAN. I will agree with the Senator from New Hampshire to this extent, that newspapers are very often mistaken and that the newspapers sometimes in certain instances are very unjust. I have experienced a good deal of that sort of treatment myself, and I know it; but I go, in my assumption as to the existing situation, simply on the knowledge of human nature which fifty-eight years knocking up and down the world has given me, and a rather keen watching with the one eye I have got. [Laughter.] Unless there is some instrumentality of coercion, some terrorizing influence which compels apparent acquiescence in and obedience to the Executive will, and unless you fear that he will exercise his great influence to see that you are defeated when you are up for reelection or decline to give you any of the patronage of your respective States, for the life of me, knowing you as I do to be patriotic gentlemen, most of you, I swear I can not think what it is unless it be the fear of losing patronage. I know many of you do not approve of the action of the President in many respects.

But I started to go into the newspaper business. I want to bring in evidence here a witness called the other day for a different purpose by my distinguished friend from Maryland [Mr. RAYNER], which exemplifies to my mind the truest and fullest and best definition of the relationship of the press to the people and the Government and its value to anything that has ever been put upon paper. Writing from Paris in 1787 to Edward Carrington, Thomas Jefferson used this language:

> The basis of our Government being the opinion of the people, the very first object should be to keep that right; and were it left to me to decide whether we should have a government without newspapers or newspapers without a government I should not hesitate a moment to prefer the latter. But I should mean that every man should receive those papers and be capable of reading them. I am convinced that those societies (as the Indians) which live without government enjoy in their general mass an infinitely greater degree of happiness than those who live under the European governments. Among the former public opinion is in the place of law, and restrains morals as powerfully as laws ever did anywhere. Among the latter, under pretense of governing, they have divided their nations into two classes—wolves and sheep. I do not exaggerate. This is a true picture of Europe—

Recollect this was two years before the outbreak of the French Revolution—

> Cherish, therefore, the spirit of our people and keep alive their attention. Do not be too severe upon their errors, but reclaim them by enlightening them. If once they become inattentive to the public affairs you and I and Congress and assemblies, judges, and governors shall all become wolves. It seems to be the law of our general nature, in spite of individual exceptions, and experience declares that man is the only animal which devours his own kind, for I can apply no milder term to the governments of Europe and to the general prey of the rich on the poor.

I would be glad if in the highest degree the great newspapers of this country would make that the cardinal principle governing the conduct of those great enlightening influences. But having quoted Mr. Jefferson himself as to his idea of the value of newspapers, I want to direct your attention to a phase of present newspaper work that was never contemplated by Mr. Jefferson or anybody else, and which is an outgrowth of the last ten or fifteen years, mainly and principally in the last five or seven, and that is the use of the newspapers, these instruments of education and enlightenment, not for that purpose, but for the purpose of sifting sand in the eyes of their readers and to giving out false information and misinformation and the dissemination of falsehoods and arguments, and the presentation of the worse for the better reason. We have had a glaring illustration of this phase of newspaper work in the employment of Mr. Bishop. Mr. Bishop, the bosom friend of the President, his trusted agent and lieutenant, was given $10,000 a year to run a press bureau to defend the Administration against critics and others who dared say anything against the management of the Panama Canal.

But the President has not just learned the value of handling news. This experience in having Mr. Bishop transmit to those papers that would take it the news, colored and labeled as he saw fit, respecting the inner thought and purpose and wishes of the Executive is by no manner of means his first experience with a press agent. I have not all the facts, but I could hunt them up; but I have a pretty good recollection of what I read. I recall the fact that when the war with Spain was on, and the Army went to Guantanamo Bay, landed, started on its march, almost daily there were telegrams about the Rough Riders, and when that contest came on on the slopes of San Juan Hill——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. The bill (S. 529) to promote the national defense, to create a naval reserve, to establish American ocean-mail lines to foreign markets, to promote commerce, and to provide revenue from tonnage.

Mr. GALLINGER. The Senator from Florida [Mr. MALLORY] announced yesterday that he would address himself to this bill at 2 o'clock to-day. I ask the Senator from Florida what are his wishes in reference to the matter?

Mr. MALLORY. I am perfectly willing to allow the Senator from South Carolina to proceed to the conclusion of his remarks. I told him that this morning.

Mr. TILLMAN. The Senator from New Hampshire has the floor, and it is only by unanimous consent that the unfinished business can be laid aside.

Mr. GALLINGER. In reference to the unfinished business, I desire simply to say that the bill was reported to the Senate something over a month ago. Of course, all Senators have taken an opportunity to examine it, I have no doubt. Being in charge of that bill, I wish to urge its consideration with as much speed as possible; yet I realize that under existing circumstances we can not expect to interrupt the Senator from South Carolina in his most interesting speech. I therefore join with the Senator from Florida in asking that the unfinished business may be temporarily laid aside until the Senator from South Carolina has concluded his remarks.

Mr. President, before I take my seat I will say that after the Senator from Florida has addressed himself to this subject and presented the views of the minority of the Committee on Commerce on the question I will then take an opportunity to ask the Senate to fix a day, not in the immediate future, for taking a vote on the bill which is now the unfinished business.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from New Hampshire asks unanimous consent that the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside until the Senator from South Carolina concludes his remarks. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

Mr. TILLMAN. I am very much obliged to the Senator from New Hampshire for his courtesy.

When I was interrupted I was remarking that the present occupant of the White House has known for a good while the value of the newspapers, and I was proceeding to relate from recollection my remembrance of the fact that when his great military reputation was being made in Cuba it was rather a queer and strange experience for a man who had read something of the dispatches from the civil war, when there were real grown-up battles being fought to see how much stress was laid and how much notice was given to the action of the Rough Rider Regiment and its lieutenant-colonel, while other officers and commands were ignored. The colonel seemed by some hocus pocus to be in a condition of eclipse, although he has since blossomed out and grown very brilliant above the military horizon. But Colonel Roosevelt was this, and Colonel Roosevelt was that; Colonel Roosevelt was here, and Colonel Roosevelt was there. I do not say it in any spirit of carping criticism, for I recognize in the fullest degree the valuable services of Colonel Roosevelt.

I am ready to give due meed of praise to the man who is a brave soldier, who did his duty, who won renown, risked his life, and all that kind of thing, but it did seem a little queer that as to the officers of the Regular Army who bore the brunt of the battle, who offered up their lives in their country's cause—colonels, men higher in official position than he, they and their regiments—were hardly mentioned except in the official reports. Photographs were taken, and since the war has been over I have seen or heard somewhere an account of a great historic painting which depicts Colonel Roosevelt on horseback leading his regiment up San Juan Hill, when as a matter of fact Colonel Roosevelt was never on San Juan Hill on that day or time.

I say the President of the United States should well know, and does know, the value of the press agents. I do not want to detract one iota from any of his well-earned fame. I know he has shown himself by actual votes as the most popular man who ever offered for the Presidency, and all that kind of thing. But the glamor of success, the glory, the halo of his achievements, do not obscure the actualities. I say to you in all seriousness that Theodore Roosevelt owes more of his success as a public man to the newspaper men of this country than any other one instrumentality.

And then see, Senators, how he has come to be President, not only President by accident, but President by the voice of the people. See what his attitude is toward this great estate. He threatens, so I hear, he hectors, he reprimands, he causes men to be discharged. He has the White House news corralled, and his executive officers—the Cabinet—are forbidden to give out items relating to their special official duties. The news is colored and sifted to suit his idea of what it ought to be to maintain the great popularity which he has won, to preserve in the imagination of the people the hold he has on them.

Speaking allegorically, the actual condition at the White House has been for many, many months that of a quack doctor who has certain pills which he wishes to prescribe for the public. The newspapers have been the spoon, Mr. Loeb has been the apothecary, and Roosevelt's pills on Panama, Roosevelt's pills on Roosevelt, Roosevelt's pills on railway rate legislation, Roosevelt's pills on everything pertaining to public affairs are administered in this way; and because the newspapers have resented this interference with their ancient rights and privileges, have seen fit in recent months to lose some of that attitude of fulsome adulation, of lending themselves to this process of becoming a funnel through which this quack physic was to be sent abroad, because they have presumed, some of them, to deny certain official statements from the White House, there is great wrath in the Executive Mansion.

I will only illustrate as the saddest example, the most pitiful that has ever come to my knowledge of anything associated with the name of a President, the recent outrage upon Mrs. Morris. You are all familiar with the newspaper stories as they were allowed to be published by the proprietors. I know of one instance in which the story, straightforward, unvarnished, was not published because of a feeling that the paper would be boycotted, as one paper has been boycotted, and by Executive order its representative denied access even to the Executive Departments. I waited. I have waited a week or more prayerfully hoping that for the honor of this country and for the honor of its President he would take some action looking to a recognition of the fact that there was a feeling of outrage and of anger in the bosoms of American men worthy of the name and of all American women that this gentlewoman, this lady of refinement and education and of culture, because of some little trangression of the ironclad rules which now obtain, this woman sitting there quietly, trying to get access to the President for the presentation of a plea or explanation, was seized by order of the President's secretary or assistant secretary, dragged rudely across the pavement and the lawn, thrust into a cab, her clothes torn off her—I understand the earring was torn out of one ear—and she was then committed to the house of detention like a common drab——

Mr. HALE. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from South Carolina yield to the Senator from Maine?

Mr. TILLMAN. Certainly.

Mr. HALE. I hope, Mr. President, that I shall never figure in this body as a general apologist either for the Administration or the President or anybody connected with him, but I say to the Senator from South Carolina that he is making statements and assuming facts for which there is no warrant, and that he is making the most serious and defamatory charges against the Executive of this country, the President of all the United States, having nothing whatever that he adduces as proof. I must say to the Senator that I do not deem it seemly that here in the Senate he should make this the occasion of discharging before us the personal feeling of ill will he has against the President of the United States. It is not a spectacle that any of us can look upon either with satisfaction or toleration.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President, I have such respect for the great ability, high character, and patriotic services of the Senator from Maine, and have had such intimate association with him during my service here, which is not half so long as his own, that he can not say anything in the way of reprimand to cause me to lose my temper. I want to say to you, sir, that I am not defaming Theodore Roosevelt, and I have not allowed my personal feelings, supposing I have any, to dictate one utterance of mine to-day. I want to say to you, sir, that if you will offer a resolution appointing a committee of this body, composed of Republicans alone, to examine into the facts, I will give you the names of four witnesses as reputable as you or I who will swear to the statement I have made as to what actually occurred.

Mr. HALE. Let the Senator produce his testimony——

Mr. TILLMAN. You present your committee.

Mr. HALE. And his affidavits before he stands up before the country and assails in this rude way the President of the United States.

Mr. TILLMAN. Ah, will you then offer your resolution appointing a committee to get at the facts?

Mr. HALE. Let the Senator himself offer it.

Mr. TILLMAN. It is none of my business. It is your business.

Mr. HALE. It is as much the Senator's business as it is mine.

Mr. TILLMAN. No; you have just accused me of having personal animosity and hatred to gratify.

Mr. HALE. I do not credit the exaggerated statements of the newspaper press about this incident. I believe they are all extravagant, swollen, and not justified by the facts; but whenever any Senator upon his responsibility declares that there should be an investigation and asks for an investigation, so that we may have, not statements, not virulence, not denunciation, but facts, nobody on this side will object to that resolution.

Mr. TILLMAN. I will offer it and put you to the test.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair would call the attention of Senators to the rule of the Senate which requires Senators in speaking to address the Chair. The Senator from South Carolina.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President, I am very sorry that I transgressed, and I will try not to do so any more.

I want to get the record straight in this trial in regard to what actually occurred, and I will read the statement made at the White House as to what did occur, given out by Mr. Barnes.

STATEMENT MADE AT WHITE HOUSE.

In view of the inaccurate statements appearing in the press concerning the case of Mrs. Minor Morris, Assistant Secretary Barnes to-day made the following statement:

"Mrs. Morris called at the Executive office yesterday at about 1 o'clock and asked to be allowed to see the President. At the time Secretary Loeb was engaged with the President, and Mr. Barnes saw her. Upon inquiry as to the nature of her business she stated with considerable reluctance that her husband had been unjustly dismissed from a branch of the War Department; that she did not propose to have anything to do with the Secretary of War concerning it, but that she wanted the President to take it up and see that justice was done.

"She was informed that the President could not give personal attention to such a matter, and that the decision of the Secretary of War would be final. She insisted that she must see the President, and when told that that was out of the question, she asserted in boisterous manner that she would not be prevented from seeing him, and that she would remain where she was for a month, if need be, unless she saw him sooner.

"She was allowed to remain for some moments. When Mr. Barnes returned to the reception room shortly after he found her pacing excitedly up and down the room and informed her as quietly as possible that she could not see the President and that it would be useless for her to remain longer. She replied in a loud voice that she would see him and that she would stay there until she did. She was then advised to drop the matter and to go away quietly.

"This, in still louder tones, she refused to do. She was then told that she must either leave the office at once voluntarily or it would be necessary to have her put out of the building. At this she shrieked at the top of her voice, 'I will not be put out,' rushed to a chair, threw herself into it and shouted: 'Don't you have any hands laid on me; I am going to stay here until I see the President.'

SCREAMS ECHOED THROUGH MANSION.

"Mrs. Morris's piercing shrieks were heard throughout the building, and it became necessary in the interest of order to have her removed. She was accordingly taken in charge by a police officer, who had witnessed the whole affair. He asked her to go with him quietly. She refused and told him that if she was removed she would have to be dragged every step of the way. Before applying force the officer asked her three times to leave the office quietly. She shrieked her refusal to each request and was then led from the room.

She struggled violently with two police officers, striking, kicking, and biting them, all the way from the office building to the eastern entrance of the White House. As soon as she was outside of the office building she threw herself on the ground, and it became necessary to carry her. The officers repeatedly asked her to stand up and walk quietly with them, so that they would not have to use force, but she refused to do so and defied them in shrieks that were heard throughout the White House.

She was finally removed to police headquarters, where she was charged with disorderly conduct. After her arrest she produced an envelope addressed to the President, which she asked to have delivered to him. This envelope was found to contain a lengthy poem on the subject of insomnia, which she said was her own composition. She stated to the officers that she had not slept for seven nights past.

There is no truth whatever in the statement made by many of this morning's papers that a negro laid hold of Mrs. Morris and assisted in carrying her. One of the colored messengers of the office followed the policemen and gathered up such small articles as were dropped in the woman's struggles, but there was no other foundation whatever for the statement."

We have of late been having history made daily, like having your picture taken while you wait—history by the Mergenthaler machine; history by the man who was most concerned. I have waited this long because I hoped, I believed, I almost prayed, for the honor of the nation, that, this thing having occurred at the White House, the President would himself investigate and see whether or not there was the slightest foundation for this story. He has not seen fit to do it. Wrapped in his own atmosphere of high office and self-esteem, I will say, taught by us as Senators and Representatives, because we passed a very stringent law in regard to his protection—and I wanted him protected, and I want him protected yet; I am not disposed to carp at any proper methods for his protection—but what I want to call attention to is the fact that a man with a mother, with a wife, with a daughter, and with other children, and with all the attributes of any other man, I will say, or he ought to have them, has seen fit to ignore the action of his subordinates; he has seen fit to indorse it by his silence; he has seen fit to let the thing go as a matter of course, as a thing that is to happen whenever one of his subordinates—

> Drest in a little brief authority,
> * * * *
> Plays such fantastic tricks before high heaven
> As make the angels weep—

If they are the appointees of Theodore Roosevelt and the citizen, the ordinary man or woman, the lady or gentleman, is to be treated with this indignity and nothing is to be done to protect her or protect him.

I will say, for the information of the Senator from Maine, that it has come to me in one of those little whispers that go about that this thing has been repeated, only in a milder and less offensive way, but that another lady of refinement, who sought to get access to the President, had been arrested, carried to the house of detention, and held as a dangerous person. However, probably all the facts will come out if the Senator and his colleagues will vote for the resolution which I shall offer. But I, in the interest of history, have felt willing upon my own responsibility as a Senator and as a man, knowing that I might be charged with personal hatred and malice, as the Senator has charged, and have felt it my duty to take this matter up to the extent of making inquiry and to get the facts as they actually occurred in the view of at least four men of character.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President——

Mr. TILLMAN. I want to read it now, if the Senator will permit me.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from South Carolina yield to the Senator from Maine?

Mr. TILLMAN. Certainly; go ahead.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, the longer I continue in this great body the more respect I have for it, for its members, for its dignity, and for its intrinsic importance as a part of the Government. It is a great restraining power; it will never cease to be a great restraining power in legislation and in all matters where it is confronted either by the Executive or by another branch of the Legislature.

I think Senators who come here new learn day by day that lesson of confidence in and respect for it and respect for its members, and that their animosities and their prejudices gradually disappear. I think the Senator from South Carolina has been an instance of that. I have from year to year, as he has been a member of this body, taken satisfaction in the growth of his real abiding and intelligent interest in public affairs; in the advance that has been constantly seen in his power here as a debater, and his power to illuminate subjects upon which he touches. I am profoundly disappointed that to-day he should have seen fit to give us such—I will not say an exhibition, because I wish to use no offensive word—but that he should have brought forward not the large things in his character, not the great capacities that he has, not the power he has of discussing and illuminating subjects, but a prejudice and dislike and, I am afraid, a hatred. While it is not for me to admonish him, I do not think the Senator should make the Senate an arena for such a demonstration on his part.

We do not all agree with the President. Frequently I do not agree with the President, and the Senator is wrong and is unjust in intimating that the Senate is bowing before the President and is crooking the hinges of its knees that it may control patronage and power. The President has found already, and recognizes the fact, that the Senate is an independent body. There has never been a President that has more freely consulted with Senators, and there has never been a President to whom Senators have spoken more frankly than the present Senate with the present President. I do not hesitate; my friend from Rhode Island [Mr. ALDRICH] does not hesitate, nor the Senator from Illinois [Mr. HOPKINS], nor the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. SPOONER], nor the Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON], nor my friend at my left [Mr. LODGE], nor any other Senator, old or young, to tell the President how we feel, and that we disagree with him.

The Senator is wrong in undertaking to give the impression that this great body is bowing down before the President and giving up its rights. I do not think, Mr. President, that there was ever a time when Senators were freer to express to the President of the United States their dissent from his propositions as well as their assent; and I do not think there has ever been a time when that dissent has been expressed that it has been received more cordially than at present. I will not say always acted upon, but nobody that I know of has ever been punished, I will tell the Senator from South Carolina, because he has expressed his dissent from propositions that the President brings forward.

I will not submit to this arraignment of the Senate; I will not submit to the impression that is to be given to the country that undue power has been usurped and that this body has been faulty in any standing up for the rights of the whole Government and the relations that exist between the different branches of the Government.

The Senator may be here long—I hope he will—but he will never see under this Administration or any other any danger come because the Senate abdicates its powers.

Mr. TILLMAN. I really think the Senator from Maine might have waited for his compliments and criticisms, his mixture of bitter and sweet, until I got through.

Mr. HALE. I beg the Senator's pardon. The Senator knows we are in the habit of interrupting.

Mr. TILLMAN. I think from the Senator from Maine is also due me an apology for asserting a second time, when I have told him that it is not true, that my work here to-day in bringing out the things that I have brought out is due to personal hatred.

Mr. HALE. Well, the Senator himself ought to be the judge of that undoubtedly.

Mr. TILLMAN. Well, I can say it before Almighty God.

Mr. HALE. But as to interrupting him, I beg the Senator's pardon. He knows the fashion that we have here—and sometimes it is not a good fashion—of interrupting each other. He interrupts me as well as other Senators very frequently, and I interrupt other Senators. It is a fashion we have got into.

Mr. TILLMAN. It is always a pleasure for me to let the Senator from Maine take the floor, because he invariably enlightens matters.

I was just getting ready to read, Mr. President, a contribution to the truth of history by an eyewitness, for whose honesty and honor and cleanness of life and record as a man I vouch, and I will produce him as a witness when the time comes, and the Senate shall have ordered the investigation which the Senator from Maine has promised shall be given, for I shall see to it in the morning that, if you want to have the facts and are not afraid to have the testimony produced under oath, they shall be produced before a committee charged to investigate and report.

If the President himself had done his duty as a man and as a gentleman he would have seen that this thing was investigated to the bottom the moment he heard of it. When he found an indignity had been put upon a refined woman, or even a common woman, or upon any woman who is respectable, he should have gone to her, as a matter of kindness, or sent to her, as a matter of kindness, apologies for the mistake of his underling, and have sent that underling about his business. But I can not set up canons for the guidance of Theodore Roosevelt in anything. I am not so presumptuous as that. But this is what occurred, as I will undertake to prove:

Coming in from lunch at 1 o'clock, I noticed in the general lobby, near Mr. Loeb's door, a lady, whom I afterwards found out to be Mrs. Minor Morris, sitting very quietly, evidently waiting to see one of the secretaries. I entered the press room and engaged in a general conversation with three newspaper men who were in there. The door to the press room is always open, and as the hour was near the President's lunch hour everything was unusually quiet in the lobby. Very suddenly we heard a loud exclamation which sounded like "Oh, no, no; don't do that." All of us jumped to the door and entered the main room, where we found a secret-service officer and Officer Frech in the act of pulling the woman out of the chair in which she was sitting. Prior to this we had heard no loud voice, and I am positive there was no boisterous conduct. A word spoken above an ordinary tone would have reached our ears very easily. The men pulled the woman to the door, where Officer Murphy relieved the secret-service man. Their object was to get her to the guardroom, just opposite the Treasury building. To do this they had to carry her down the path leading to the basement of the White House and through the long corridor used during the receptions. Before going 20 feet Mrs. Morris fell to her knees, but was jerked to her feet and dragged on. Before they disappeared from sight she must have fallen six or eight times. Just before disappearing through the archway leading to the basement, I saw a negro man, Charlie Reeder, the President's footman, rush out and pick her up by the heels. The last I saw of Mrs. Morris she was being carried off like a sack of salt, with the negro at her feet and her dress hanging above her knees. I went around to the guardroom and saw Mrs. Morris literally thrown into an awaiting cab.

Mr. GALLINGER. Will the Senator give the name of the writer?

Mr. TILLMAN. I want an investigation first. I move now, so as to get this matter straight—I have got the names of three other men who were there—if you will permit me to have unanimous consent, I move you, sir, that a committee of five Senators be appointed to take up this subject-matter, which is Mrs. Morris's expulsion from the White House, and investigate it, and send for persons and papers.

Mr. HALE. The motion is not in form. Let the Senator prepare his resolution in form, so that it will cover just what he wants, and let him submit it to-morrow morning.

Mr. TILLMAN. I will do it in the morning.

Mr. HALE. While I can not speak for other Senators, I shall not oppose it, but I would rather it should be in form. The Senator sees the force of that.

Mr. TILLMAN. I understand that, and would not have offered it now in this unparliamentary way but for the fact that I am deeply interested, not as a personal enemy of the President, but as a Senator and a man, to have this matter sifted and the truth made known.

Mr. HALE. Let it go over until the Senator prepares his resolution.

Mr. TILLMAN. And until the resolution is passed.

Mr. HOPKINS. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from South Carolina yield to the Senator from Illinois?

Mr. TILLMAN. With pleasure.

Mr. HOPKINS. Before the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE] takes his seat, on the question of agreement to a resolution of this kind it seems to me that it is entirely out of harmony with the practice of this body, and would be an unseemly incident. I do not think the Senate has any more right to investigate that matter than the President would have the right to investigate the affairs of the Senate or the affairs of the Senator from South Carolina.

Mr. HALE. I have said that I do not speak for anybody else. I do not claim to do so. When the Senator's resolution, put in form, in writing, is read from the desk of the Secretary to-morrow morning, every Senator then will have and will exercise his right of objecting or assenting to it. I have simply said that I would not object. I do not think it is a very dignified proceeding, but I will not object.

Mr. DANIEL. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from South Carolina yield to the Senator from Virginia?

Mr. TILLMAN. With pleasure.

Mr. DANIEL. If the Senator will allow me, I was just going to say that I hope he will not offer that resolution. It is a very delicate matter, and it is one that we perhaps might not like to discuss here at this time. It is to be presumed that the President of the United States in his own house, the head house of the country, will do what is right about such a thing, and we ought not to assume from the statement of anyone else that he has not done what is right about it. It seems to me an invasion of the comity of government for one branch of the Legislature to take up a matter of this sort without any intimation or inquiry at headquarters. I hope the Senator will consult with his colleagues and deliberate and not on an occasion like this introduce before the Senate of the United States a matter of this kind. It is a household concerning which we are invited to pass a resolution of investigation, and there is something to my mind quite repulsive about that, though nothing could be more repulsive than any improper conduct toward a lady of this country.

I hope the Senator will defer even further allusions to such a subject. I am sorry that he has said what he has said. I regret the whole matter on this floor, though I am sure no one will question that I will go as far as any gentleman in doing what is appropriate in defense of a lady or a man who has been maltreated in the capital of the United States. But this is not a tribunal, under the conditions represented, with imperfect knowledge and merely upon ex parte statements, which ought to take jurisdiction; and if any step is taken—if it should be deemed proper to take one—it should be done cautiously, with deliberation at each step, and with intimation of knowledge beforehand as to what we were doing.

I regret the Senator's remarks upon this subject, and I hope he will permit me, without offense to him, to make these suggestions on account of the nature of the body which he has invited to consider the matter.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President, I am admonished from two such high quarters, by men both of whom hold the highest possible place in my esteem and respect, that I would not in my own brusk, frank, and straightforward way do anything to trench upon propriety or to cause the Senate any feeling of regret. But these officers are paid out of the public Treasury; they are a part of the White House force of subordinates. The police and the secret-service men are a part of the necessary machinery for the protection of the President. We had both under Mr. McKinley. We have had both since it has become a kind of tradition in this country that cranks will assassinate Presidents occasionally.

I want to ask those who are admonishing me with such force and vigor, What are you going to do about it? A statement which I believe to be false has been given out at the White House. I believe that statement to be false because I have the statement of a man whom I know, who has no purpose or object in view, who merely happened to be there by accident and saw what occurred. Finding that the official version did this poor woman injustice and wrong, he felt under the impulse of his manhood the necessity of standing up, if need be, and taking the consequences and being boycotted or turned off or having whatever thing you could do done to him. I have understood that one of these newspaper men has had this woman's shrieks and appeals for help ringing in his ears, and has been upbraiding himself and shed tears for two days whenever he mentioned it, because he feels self-contempt that he did not rush to her assistance even at the risk of his life.

Now, what are you going to do about it? Are you going to rely only on your great dignity and permit the imperialistic programme to go on without limit? Is there a sadder instance which could occur than that of a lady of refinement having been committed to the house of detention, or somewhere else, her friends telegraphed for and rushing there to explain that she was harmless and a good woman and all that kind of thing?

What are you going to do? That is the point. Settle that. Will you do nothing? Then indeed will the Senate sink into the contempt, and deserved contempt, of every decent man and woman on this continent.

I will take the responsibility, and let the question of good manners, and good taste, and Senatorial dignity pass for what it is worth, and let the judgment be what it may. I will take the consequences and I will offer the resolution and let you vote as you see fit upon your responsibility to your oaths and to your position here officially as well as to your position as husbands and fathers. As I said, if you order this investigation, I stand ready to bring forward these four witnesses and let them stand on their record as gentlemen. Now, do what you please when the time comes.

But you recall other facts in regard to him, that in the very recent past—the newspapers, the poor, pitiful liars, as men call them, have sent them broadcast—he has written a letter of some sort of sympathy and other things to Fitzsimmons, the prize fighter; that he is known to glory in his physique; that he has had experts in the art of boxing and jiu jitsu at the White House, and has not felt too dignified to make an exhibit of himself with boxing gloves on, and all that kind of thing, leading the strennous life of which he is the exponent.

We can recall that this letter to Fitzsimmons was written just about the time that Mrs. Morris was treated so brutally. I waited hopefully, earnestly desiring to see him do something for his own fame, for his own credit, for his own character as a gentleman, in this Morris incident; and it was only after he showed a besotted indifference to public opinion as expressed in the newspapers that I felt called on and willing to bring forward a true statement of the facts, and to let the country, if it wants to, go to the bottom through you or whatever instrumentality can be set in motion looking to getting the exact occurrences as they happened, and not the garbled statements, not the misstatements, not the falsehoods of Mr. Barnes.

It is not my special province to play Don Quixote and roam around the country, in Washington or elsewhere, as the champion of distressed women. But in my home, since my mother, who is now dead, used to hug me to her bosom—a widow, and I a baby—and say, "My son, tell the truth," and since her departure my association for thirty-eight years with another woman as a wife, who has been an inspiration and solace, dividing my cares and doubling my joys simply by sharing them, my every instinct as a man has taught me to respect and love women. And when I see a man who ought to be a gentleman, although in high official position, ignore his plain duty to seek out the truth, make due apology, right the wrong as far as he could, and punish those about him who are guilty of these outrages, I say I would have been false to every instinct of my nature if I had remained silent on this occasion.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. What disposition does the Senator from South Carolina desire to have made of his resolution?

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After seven minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at 3 o'clock and 5 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Thursday, January 18, 1906, at 12 o'clock meridian.

CONFIRMATIONS.

Executive nominations confirmed by the Senate January 17, 1906.

COLLECTORS OF CUSTOMS.

Robert Carson, of New Jersey, to be collector of customs for the district of Perth Amboy, in the State of New Jersey.

Fred Enos, of Connecticut, to be collector of customs for the district of Fairfield, in the State of Connecticut.

MARSHAL.

William Henkel, of New York, to be United States marshal for the southern district of New York.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, January 17, 1906.

The House met at 12 m.

The following prayer was offered by the Chaplain, Rev. HENRY N. COUDEN, D. D.:

We thank Thee, our Father in Heaven, for that deep and abiding faith which has upheld, sustained, and guided Thy children through all the vicissitudes of the past and kept them close to Thee, and for that blessed hope which in darkest hours of grief and despair has illumined, supported, and comforted them. Grant that these angels of mercy may be the solace and comfort of the Member whose home has been visited by death, depriving him of the companion who has shared his joys and sorrows, hopes and disappointments, victories and defeats; and may Thou comfort the motherless children and help them all to look forward to that bright realm where sorrows and death shall not enter; and Thine shall be the praise, through Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read, corrected, and approved.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Ephriam N. R. Ahl, late of Battery C, Fifth Regiment United States Artillery, and pay him a pension at the rate of $40 per month in lieu of that he is now receiving.

The amendments recommended by the committee were read, as follows:

In line 6 strike out the words "Ephriam N. R. Ahl" and insert in lieu thereof the words "Ephraim N. R. Ohl."

In line 8 strike out the word "forty" and insert in lieu thereof the word "thirty-six."

Amend the title so as to read: "A bill granting an increase of pension to Ephraim N. R. Ohl."

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be laid aside with a favorable recommendation.

Mr. SULLOWAY. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise and report the bills to the House with the recommendations made by the committee.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. CAPRON, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House, reported that that committee had had under consideration certain bills on the Private Calendar and had directed him to report some without amendments with the recommendation that they do pass, and some with amendments with the recommendation that the amendments be adopted and the bills as amended do pass.

Mr. SULLOWAY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the previous question may be considered as ordered on the amendments and bills to their final passage.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New Hampshire asks unanimous consent that the previous question be considered as ordered on the bills and the amendments thereto to their final passage. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. CRANE introduced a joint resolution (S. R. 20) directing the selection of a site for the erection of a bronze statue in Washington, D. C., in honor of the late Henry Wadsworth Longfellow; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Library.

AMENDMENTS TO BILLS.

Mr. HEYBURN submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (S. 87) providing for the withdrawal from public entry of lands needed for town-site purposes in connection with irrigation projects under the reclamation act of June 17, 1902, and for other purposes; which was referred to the Committee on Irrigation and the Reclamation of Arid Lands, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. CLAPP submitted an amendment proposing to appropriate $15,000 to pay the indebtedness already incurred in suppressing the spread of smallpox in the Indian Territory during the fiscal year 1900, etc., intended to be proposed by him to the Indian appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

He also (by request) submitted an amendment providing for the payment of interest at the rate of 5 per cent per annum on shares of money due minor Indians as their proportion of the proceeds of the sale of ceded and tribal Indian lands, etc., intended to be proposed to the Indian appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

He also (by request) submitted an amendment relative to the repeal of that part of section 3, act of August 3, 1876, which requires the Commissioner of Indian Affairs to embody in his annual report a detailed and tabular statement of all bids and proposals received for any services, supplies, and annuity goods for the Indian service, etc., intended to be proposed to the Indian appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. KEAN submitted an amendment proposing an appropriation to pay H. C. Adams, Colin H. Livingstone, E. H. McDermot, John W. Fenton, jr., William H. Gaskin, W. A. Smith, Peter Riley, John R. Williams, and E. C. Goodwin, for services rendered to the Committee on Interstate Commerce of the Senate, in connection with the hearings on railroad-rate regulation, intended to be proposed by him to the urgent deficiency appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

COMPLEMENT OF CREWS OF VESSELS.

Mr. FRYE. I move that the bill (S. 27) to amend section 4463 of the Revised Statutes, relating to the complement of crews of vessels, which was reported by me, be recommitted to the Committee on Commerce.

The motion was agreed to.

JOSHUA T. REYNOLDS.

Mr. TELLER. I move that the Committee on Claims be discharged from the further consideration of the bill (S. 1862) for the relief of Joshua T. Reynolds, and that it be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, to which it should have been referred in the first instance.

The motion was agreed to.

REGULATION OF RAILROAD RATES.

Mr. FULTON. I ask to have referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce the amendment intended to be proposed by me to the bill (S. 2261) to amend an act entitled "An act to regulate commerce," approved February 4, 1887, and all acts amendatory thereof, which I discussed the other day.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

RECOGNITION OF INDEPENDENCE OF NEW FOREIGN STATE.

On motion of Mr. HALE, it was Ordered, That 200 additional copies of Senate Document No. 56, Fifty-fourth Congress, second session, on the "Power to Recognize the Independence of a New Foreign State," be printed for the use of the Senate document room.

REORGANIZATION OF THE CONSULAR SERVICE.

On motion of Mr. LODGE, it was Ordered, That Senate Report No. 112, to accompany the bill (S. 1345) to provide for the reorganization of the consular service, be reprinted.

PUBLIC BUILDING IN SELMA, ALA.

Mr. PETTUS. I ask that the bill (S. 343) concerning a public building in Selma, Ala., be considered. The bill carries no appropriation with it. The appropriation has already been made. It merely changes a post-office building into a building for a post-office and court-house. The Secretary of the Treasury has been waiting to have authority from Congress to make the change. Since the original bill was passed and the appropriation made Congress has established a United States court at that place, and it is necessary that the building should be both for a court-house and a post-office.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Alabama asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of a bill, which will be read.

The Secretary read the bill; and, there being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

THE COMMITTEE ON THE PHILIPPINES.

Mr. LODGE submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Philippines be, and the same is hereby, authorized to employ a stenographer from time to time, as may be necessary, to report such hearings as may be had on bills or other matters pending before said committee, and to have the same printed and indexed for the use of the committee, and that such stenographer and indexer be paid out of the contingent fund of the Senate. The committee is also authorized to sit during the sessions of the Senate.

PROPOSED INVESTIGATION OF INCIDENT AT WHITE HOUSE.

Mr. TILLMAN. I send to the desk a resolution for which I ask immediate consideration.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, That the President of the Senate be authorized to appoint a committee of five Senators to investigate the recent unfortunate incident at the White House, resulting in the expulsion from the Executive Offices of Mrs. Minor Morris, and report to the Senate.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from South Carolina asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of the resolution. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President, I desire simply to make a brief explanation.

It was not my purpose yesterday to go as far as this in mentioning the Morris incident, but I was taunted beyond all endurance by the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE]. He had no justification whatsoever, in my view, for charging me with defaming the Chief Executive of this country and with doing it as a matter of personal enmity.

It is possible—I hope it may so result—that he builded wiser than he knew. He challenged me to action. I have acted. It is for the Senate to determine for itself what shall be done.

There are two broad and vital questions involved in this resolution, simple as it may be.

The first is that we must as far as we can protect the President of the United States from dangerous characters—assassination and other things like that. The other is that we must protect the liberties and rights of the people of the United States. If we are to protect the President absolutely, we have got to make him a prisoner in actuality and protect him with guards and allow no one to have access to him who has not been searched, because it is a self-evident proposition that any man or woman, however weak, who is willing to offer up his or her own life can take the life of another, however guarded he may be, unless he is a prisoner in jail.

But, sir, when the President shall have offered up his life as a victim in the way that has caused this country so much of sorrow in numerous instances in our history, the President can be replaced by another man, who will discharge the duties of the office probably as well or better than he himself had done. But when the liberties of the people are destroyed there is nothing left but despotism. We ought not to permit the use in this country of Russian or Turkish methods toward the people.

That is the whole subject as far as I care to present it.

Mr. DANIEL. Mr. President, if any gentleman wishes to speak on this subject I would not cut him off. Otherwise, I move to lay the resolution on the table.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Virginia moves to lay the resolution of the Senator from South Carolina on the table.

Mr. LODGE. On that I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. President, I have just come into the Chamber, and ask that the resolution be read again.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The resolution will be read at the request of the Senator from Texas.

The resolution was again read, as follows:

Resolved, That the President of the Senate be authorized to appoint a committee of five Senators to investigate the recent unfortunate incident at the White House, resulting in the expulsion from the Executive Offices of Mrs. Minor Morris, and report to the Senate.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll on the motion of the Senator from Virginia to lay the resolution on the table.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. LATIMER (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the Senator from Illinois [Mr. CULLOM.] If he were present and I allowed to vote, I should vote "nay."

Mr. MALLORY (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Vermont [Mr. PROCTOR]. If he were present, I should vote "yea."

Mr. PATTERSON (when his name was called). I have a pair with the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. KITTREDGE]. If he were present, I should vote "yea."

Mr. SCOTT (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Florida [Mr. TALIAFERRO]. If he were in the Senate, I should vote "yea."

Mr. SPOONER (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. CARMACK], who is absent. I do not know how he would vote, and I, therefore, am not at liberty to vote. If it is agreeable to the Senator from Colorado [Mr. PATTERSON], we will transfer our pairs, so that the Senator from Tennessee will stand paired with the Senator from South Dakota and we will both be permitted to vote. I vote "yea."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. CLAPP (after having voted in the affirmative). Observing the absence of my pair, the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS], I desire to withdraw my vote. If he were here, as indicated, I would vote "yea."

Mr. PATTERSON. I notice that the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. KITTREDGE], with whom I am paired, is now present. I suppose he will vote. Therefore I will vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. SCOTT. I will transfer my pair to the junior Senator from New Jersey [Mr. DRYDEN] and vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. NELSON (after having voted in the affirmative). I overlooked the fact that I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. BERRY]. I transfer my pair to the senior Senator from Washington [Mr. ANKENY] and will let my vote stand.

Mr. CULBERSON (after having voted in the negative). I desire to inquire if the junior Senator from California [Mr. FLINT] has voted?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair is informed that he has not voted.

Mr. CULBERSON. As I have a general pair with that Senator, I withdraw my vote.

Mr. KITTREDGE. If agreeable to Senators interested, I should like to transfer my pair to the senior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE], which will permit me to vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas (after having voted in the affirmative). I observe that the senior Senator from Nebraska [Mr. MILLARD] has not voted. I have a general pair with him. I therefore withdraw my vote.

Mr. ALLISON (after having voted in the affirmative). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN]. I do not see that he is present in the Chamber this morning, but I have reason to know that he would vote in the affirmative if he were present. Therefore I will allow my vote to stand.

Mr. TALIAFERRO. I would ask if the junior Senator from West Virginia [Mr. SCOTT] has voted?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. He has voted.

Mr. TALIAFERRO. I vote "yea."

Mr. MALLORY. Since my name was called I have been informed by the colleague of the Senator from Vermont [Mr. PROCTOR] with whom I am paired that if he were here he would vote "yea." That being so, I will vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. LATIMER. I vote "nay."

The result was announced—yeas 54, nays 8, as follows:

YEAS—54.

Alger	Crane	Hopkins	Pettus

So the resolution was laid on the table.

REGULATION OF RAILROAD RATES.

Mr. CLAY. I submit a resolution, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, That in the opinion of the Senate there is a governmental power to fix maximum future charges of carriers by railroad, vested in the legislatures of the States with regard to transportation exclusively within the States, and vested in Congress with regard to all other transportation.

2. Although legislative power, properly speaking, can not be delegated, the lawmaking body having enacted into law the standard of charges which shall control, may intrust to an administrative body not exercising in the true sense judicial power the duty to fix rates in conformity with that standard.

3. It is the duty of Congress to provide by law that all interstate rates shall be reasonable and just, and then to delegate to the Interstate Commerce Commission the power to ascertain what rates are reasonable and just, and to enforce its findings, this power to be exercised in reviewing rates already put in operation by the roads and on complaint.

Mr. CLAY. Mr. President, I ask that the resolution for the present may lie on the table. I give notice that to-morrow after the morning business shall have been completed I shall call it up for the purpose of submitting a few remarks upon it.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The resolution will be printed and lie on the table.

IMPORTATION OF UNWHOLESOME TEA.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. If there be no further concurrent or other resolutions, the morning business is closed, and the Calendar under Rule VIII is in order. The first business on the Calendar will be stated.

The SECRETARY. A bill (S. 1548) to amend an act entitled

"An act to prevent the importation of impure and unwholesome tea," approved March 2, 1897.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill has heretofore been considered as in Committee of the Whole, and has been read.

Mr. FORAKER. I should like to have the bill read for information.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. At the request of the Senator from Ohio, the bill will be read for information.

The Secretary read the bill.

Mr. KEAN. Mr. President, is there a report accompanying that bill?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. There is a report accompanying the bill.

Mr. KEAN. I ask that the report be read.

Mr. FORAKER. Mr. President, I do not know what Senator has that bill in charge, but it seems to me that it is rather a vague provision that the importers shall give "suitable bond." Somebody should prescribe the amount of the bond and what kind of security should be given.

Mr. STONE. I reported that bill.

Mr. FORAKER. I did not know that the Senator from Missouri had charge of the bill.

Mr. STONE. The provisions is that a "suitable bond" shall be given, and I presume the amount of it would be in the control of the Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. FORAKER. We could easily give the Secretary control of the matter, but the bill, as I observed when it was read, does not give the Secretary of the Treasury control as to the amount of the bond. It simply says that after having given a "suitable bond" then the importation shall be subject to such regulations as the Secretary of the Treasury may prescribe.

Mr. STONE. Then I shall be glad to have the Senator suggest an amendment.

Mr. FORAKER. The bill should provide the amount of the bond. If that be added, I should not object.

Mr. STONE. There can be no objection whatever to doing that.

Mr. FORAKER. I should have no objection whatever to the bill if there should be inserted in connection with the provision about prescribing the regulations that the Secretary of the Treasury shall be also authorized to fix the amount of the bond.

Mr. STONE. If the Senator from Ohio will suggest a form of amendment to accomplish that, it will be satisfactory to me.

Mr. FORAKER. If I had the bill before me, I could do so in a moment. So far as I now know there is no other objection to the bill.

Mr. KEAN. I think, Mr. President, the bill had better go over.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Under objection, the bill will go over.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, if the bill now goes over when will it naturally come before the Senate?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. As it will retain its place on the Calendar, it will come naturally before the Senate to-morrow morning after the completion of the routine business.

Mr. STONE. The bill, then, does not lose its place by going over?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill does not lose its place on the Calendar.

Mr. STONE. Meantime I will consult with the Senator from Ohio [Mr. FORAKER] as to the proper form of amendment.

PURE-FOOD BILL.

Mr. HEYBURN. I ask unanimous consent that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate bill 88, being what is known as the "pure-food bill."

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 88) for preventing the manufacture, sale, or transportation of adulterated or misbranded or poisonous or deleterious foods, drugs, medicines, and liquors, and for regulating traffic therein, and for other purposes.

Mr. KEAN. Do I understand, Mr. President, that we are proceeding with the Calendar under Rule VIII?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Under Rule VIII. The question is on the amendment heretofore submitted by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE], which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 8, line 9, after the word "preparation," it is proposed to insert the following additional proviso:

Provided further, That when in the preparation of food products for shipment they are preserved by an external application applied in such manner that the preservative is necessarily removed mechanically or by maceration in water or otherwise, the provisions of this act shall be construed as applying only when said products are ready for consumption.

Mr. MCCUMBER. Mr. President, we had that amendment under consideration the day before yesterday, but it was not disposed of. I desire, however, at this time not to speak further especially upon that amendment, but more particularly upon the general phase of the entire bill. I shall take but a short time, however.

Mr. President, this bill has now been, since I have been more or less interested in it, before the Senate for about five years. It has passed the other House twice, not exactly in the same form as the pending bill, but in a similar condition. It has been almost impossible to secure any attention to or consideration of it in the Senate. I feel, however, that the remarks which have been made in the Senate upon the bill, and which have finally been taken into consideration by the public press of the country, have at last awakened a sentiment and have intensified that sentiment into an impetus on the part of the press and the public that this bill shall have consideration—an impetus which is naturally having very good results.

Mr. President, a great number of the leading magazines of the country have devoted considerable time and attention to the consideration of this matter. I believe the time has now arrived when we at least may call upon the Senate to give it that consideration which I feel—and which I feel after long study—it is entitled to.

I am not going to make another speech upon this pure-food bill. There are two reasons that justify me in this. The first is that I have spoken two or three times and gone particularly into every feature of what was practically the same bill. Another is that I am impelled to be somewhat careful in my remarks on account of the kindly and generous suggestion that was made by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] as to why the bill had not received greater consideration near the close of the last session of Congress.

There are certain principal objects of this bill that ought to be considered generally. The first object is to supplement the efforts of the States. Nearly every State in the Union already has a pure-food law or a code pertaining to the introduction of pure food. The food commissioners of the several States have been busily engaged in attempting to eradicate the evil of impure food, but they are met, Mr. President, at every point by the rules of interstate commerce and are brought face to face with a condition over which the State itself has no control. This bill is intended to supplement the laws of the several States so that they may reach the entire subject.

The next object is to reach the root of the evil itself—the manufacturer. The moment that we strike at the manufacturer of unwholesome, unfit, adulterated, or misbranded articles of food, we have reached the evil in such a way that we may be able to control it. As I have stated, inasmuch as about 95 per cent of all of the impure and improper foods are consumed in States other than those in which they are manufactured, it is quite necessary that the authority having control over interstate commerce should be the authority that should deal with the subject of the manufacture of those products for the purpose of transmitting them into other States.

Another reason is to protect the honest manufacturer and dealer. Every honest manufacturer in the United States is pleading for this bill, because he says that if he manufactures his goods in accordance with the pure-food laws of the several States or Territories, it is impossible for him to compete justly and fairly with the bogus articles that are put in competition with those manufactured by him. No elaborate discussion of that feature of the case is needed.

Another object is to prevent the evil of diverse rulings of the several commissioners of the States having pure-food laws. For instance, there is a manufacturer using certain dyes in order to make his goods appear more presentable. There is a rule in Iowa which requires certain statements to be made and to appear on the can; in another State they are made in another way; while in other States they have no rule upon the subject. Even those States that have similar rules or laws will, through their food commissioners, give dissimilar constructions. One of the objects of this bill is to assist the honest dealer in this character of goods to meet the requirements of all of the States.

We well know, Mr. President, that the moment we do pass a general law upon this subject, by virtue of that law covering ninety-odd per cent of all of the commerce in impure products, that law must become the dominant law; and, if there is any difference, the State laws will soon accommodate and modify themselves in conformity with the national legislation.

Another object is to promote honesty and fair dealing and decency in the sale and barter of food products; but, above all, to shield the public themselves, Mr. President, against not only the use of poisonous articles, but especially to protect them against deceit or imposition of any character in the matter of purchasing their food.

Now, what is it that this bill does not do? I want to state, first, that it adds no new machinery whatever. We already have in the Department of Agriculture a chemical division. That chemical division has already the authority, and we are appropriating money year by year for the very purpose that is indicated in this bill.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair will state that the consideration of the bill is proceeding under Rule VIII, which limits speeches to five minutes on the part of any Senator. If there is no objection, however, the Senator may proceed.

Mr. LODGE. I ask unanimous consent that the Senator from North Dakota may be permitted to proceed without regard to the limit of the rule.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Without objection, the Senator from North Dakota will proceed.

Mr. McCUMBER. I want to correct here, Mr. President, a wrong impression, an impression which we seem not to have been able, even during the four years of discussion on this floor, to entirely dispel, and that is the impression that we by this bill, or by any bill that has been reported by the Committee on Manufactures of the Senate, have attempted to grant the power of fixing a standard of food and drug products in any Department or in any person whatever. There was a section in the House bill as it twice passed the House, which provided for the fixing of standards of food and drugs by the Secretary of Agriculture. In both instances where we have passed upon bills from the House that section 7 has been absolutely eliminated. There is no standard whatever provided by this bill, or attempted to be provided by it. The only standard is that which is fixed by the definition of adulterated and misbranded articles. Any article that will measure up to that standard has free access into any State in the Union. In this we have followed as nearly as possible the laws of the States. The definition conforms almost strictly to the definitions which have been adopted by the State pure-food laws of the State of Kentucky.

This bill does not determine, Mr. President, what a man shall eat. He can eat anything that he desires. It does not determine what a man shall ship. He can ship anything that he desires. All that it does require is that the article shipped, if it be adulterated or misbranded, shall bear the evidence of such adulteration or misbranding upon the cask or other container of the article that is shipped. I do not think that anyone can object to that requirement.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. McCUMBER. With pleasure.

Mr. GALLINGER. My attention was attracted by a remark the Senator has just made that this bill does not prevent any person from eating what he may please, but that it requires articles of food to be sold for just what they are. I do not know whether the article I have in my hand is authentic or not, but it is an article from the National Druggist of October, 1905, from which it appears that the pure-food commissioner of Minnesota—of course he is a State official—has placed Lea & Perrin's Worcestershire sauce, which most of us have been using for a great many years, absolutely under the ban, and has prevented its importation and sale within the limits of the State of Minnesota. Perhaps the Senator has seen this article. If such a thing has been done, I think it rather a despotic exercise of power by a State official, and if this bill is going to put in the hands of the Government corps of so-called "scientists," which exists in the Department of Agriculture, many of them looking for something to do day by day and not finding it—if it is to put into the hands of those young men the power to absolutely prohibit the importation and sale of an article in this country as well established as is Lea & Perrin's Worcestershire sauce, I think it is an extraordinary power.

I want to vote for this bill, and I presume I shall vote for it, but I hope it will be so guarded in its terms—I have read it casually, but not very carefully—that no such power as seems to have been exercised by this State official will be exercised in the Department of Agriculture through those young scientists who, of course, will be anxious to do something to attract attention.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, if the Senator——

Mr. NELSON. Will the Senator from North Dakota permit me a moment?

Mr. McCUMBER. I wish first to answer that, and then I will yield to the Senator.

Mr. NELSON. I want to answer it.

Mr. McCUMBER. I will give the Senator an opportunity a little later. I desire to say that if the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER] had even casually read the bill he would find that no such possible power as he has indicated is vested in any man or body of men by this bill, but that it is impossible that such power should be so exercised in the State of Minnesota or in any other State, provided the Worcestersbire sauce referred to by the Senator is all that he claims for it. The Senator must understand that there is only one way and one final method of deciding any question of purity or impurity, of adulteration or nonadulteration, of misbranding or want of branding of any article, and that is in the usual form, in the courts of the United States. Those courts will determine all questions of that character. No head of a Department or anyone else can finally determine that question. The Secretary of Agriculture in collaboration with the heads of other branches will ascertain whether or not, in his judgment, certain ingredients or certain foods or drugs that are sold measure up to the standard which is required in the bill itself in the shape of definitions. If those definitions are not correct, then let us modify them until we make them correct. I think, however, there will be little objection to the definitions themselves.

Mr. SPOONER. Mr. President——

Mr. McCUMBER. Then, as to whether the goods measure up to that standard will be a question for the courts and not for the Secretary of Agriculture, or for a chemist or for a number of chemists, or anyone else. I now yield to the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON], and then will gladly yield to the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. SPOONER].

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, I only rose for the purpose of making a brief reply to the remarks of the Senator from New Hampshire. I am not aware of the fact that the pure-food commissioner of Minnesota has made any such decision. I do not think he has, because I have not found that there has been any practical embargo on the use of that sauce. So far as I know we have had the privilege of using it right along.

But I want to say, in connection with this matter, to the Senator from New Hampshire, assuming that the commissioner of Minnesota has taken that view of the case, this would not cure that matter. It could not cure it otherwise than that this would be paramount and controlling so far as it affected interstate commerce. If the commissioner of Minnesota made a mistake and has gone too far, certainly this bill would not affect that matter otherwise than to afford relief so far as it pertained to interstate commerce. If any injustice has been done by the commissioner of Minnesota, relief against that must be obtained either from the authorities of Minnesota or from the State or Federal courts. This legislation can certainly not affect that matter, except in the manner I have indicated.

The good effect of this law, assuming it to be true, as the Senator from New Hampshire has stated is that this general doctrine of the Government ingrafted in the bill will, wherever there is a conflict between the State law and this law, leave this law controlling and be the means of equalizing and doing justice to all parts of the country, instead of having the difficulties we now encounter in many of the States.

Mr. McCUMBER. Of course the Senator understands well that we can not interfere with what the pure-food commissioner in the State of Minnesota may do in matters that purely affect the police power of that State, after the goods have been sold there.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I must have been unfortunate in the statement I made or the Senator would not raise that question. I raised the question merely for the purpose of making the suggestion that I trusted no such power was placed in the hands of the Secretary of Agriculture in this bill as seems to have been exercised by this State official in the State of Minnesota.

Now, concerning the Minnesota matter, I have only the authority of the National Druggist, which is one of the most reputable drug papers in the country. This article says that an edict has gone forth from this State official putting this particular article under the ban and prohibiting its importation into the State of Minnesota. If that be so, of course we can not help it, but it is an extraordinary exercise of power, it seems to me.

Mr. McCUMBER. I doubt if that statement can be regarded as correct, for the reason that the State official of Minnesota could not prevent, by order or otherwise, the shipment of any proper and pure article into the State, nor could he even prevent the shipment into the State of an adulterated article unless it was absolutely and unquestionably of so poisonous or unfit a character that it could not be considered as a commercial product. Under the construction of the interstate-commerce clause of the Constitution goods other than those which I have mentioned may be shipped into a State contrary to the laws of the State and may be sold in the original unbroken packages in that State.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, notwithstanding that, it is just possible this official may have gone beyond his powers in that regard. At any rate, I have every reason to believe that the statement made by this reputable publication is correct in a general way. What I wanted to guard against or to have the Senators who have this bill in charge guard against is the possibility of putting a power of that kind in the hands of the Department of Agriculture.

Mr. McCUMBER. I believe the committee has been as careful as the Senator would have been to see that no such power is placed in the hands of any person or any Department. I believe, Mr. President, that all questions of that kind should be decided by the courts. That is what they are for. This bill simply determines that they shall be so decided by the courts and not by the Agricultural Department or any other Department.

Mr. GALLINGER. I am very glad to know that, Mr. President. I think that is a very wise provision, and I presume under that provision the citizen will have ample protection. My only anxiety about the bill this year, as it was last year, is to have it a fair and reasonable bill, a bill that will not be oppressive so far as the citizen is concerned and yet will be protective so far as the interests of the public are concerned.

Mr. McCUMBER. That is the end we seek to attain.

Mr. GALLINGER. I will say, if the Senator will permit me, that I am not so much exercised about these misbranded and so-called "poisonous" substances as some Senators are. I think we are running amuck on that matter to a very considerable extent. Human life is being lengthened in place of being shortened decade by decade, notwithstanding all the terrible things that are read of, notwithstanding the microbes and the germs and the bacilli, and all that sort of thing. Of course, if we believed all that these scientists say, these young fellows in the Department of Agriculture, we would not dare breathe, eat, or drink. But I do not believe it. So I am not as much alarmed as some. And yet I want to vote for a reasonable bill, and I hope this is a reasonable bill.

Mr. McCUMBER. I think what the Senator wants, and what all of us want more particularly than anything else, is that when we go into the markets to buy an article of food or a drug to be used in the family we shall get what we call for.

Mr. GALLINGER. And what we pay for. That is right.

Mr. McCUMBER. And what we pay for. That is the principal feature to be considered.

The Senator has alluded to the increase in the length of the life of the people. I think the Senator, however, will agree with me that the increase has not been so much possibly on account of the food we have now being better than the food we used to have as it has been on account of the advance of science, medicine, and surgery in the protection of the lives of children, and also in the home, in the greater comforts, and the lessening of the troubles we were afflicted with when people had not the means they have at the present time to care for themselves. I believe those have been the potent factors in the longevity of the human race, at least in the United States. It has been demonstrated that since they have sterilized the milk that is required to be sold, for instance, in certain cities, or since they have cared for it, there has been a wonderful decrease in the percentage of the deaths of children using that milk. I believe that much has been accomplished in that way, and much has also been accomplished in the matter of better foods.

Now, Mr. President, who are those who desire this bill? So far as I know, every reputable manufacturer in the United States wishes a bill of this kind. So far as I know, every reputable manufacturer of drugs and of liquors, as well as food products, desires a bill of this character to be passed. The people who have been defrauded, those whose families have been murdered, also join in the request. The percentage of the impure and adulterated foods in the United States is to-day becoming simply enormous as compared with twenty, thirty, or forty years ago.

Now, who are those who oppose this measure? There are a few classes. I do not know of any reputable manufacturer who opposes it, but there are, first, the whisky blenders. I had a letter a short time ago, and which, I think, I presented here before, from the National Association of Liquor Dealers, which they sent out to their trade, and by which they desired to raise the sum of $250,000. In that circular letter they declare that they, by their efforts alone, had succeeded in preventing the consideration of this measure in the Senate. I believe that to be wholly false. It was simply used as a method of securing subscriptions from the trade to carry on the crusade against a national law.

Now, why are they opposed to it? Simply because instead of blending two or three different brands of good spirituous liquors, such as will stand the test that is required by the Government, they use a number of different kinds of oils and flavors, and simply change the poorest liquor to some other character or quality by the infusion of these ingredients, and then sell it for the best character of whiskies.

I have before me here a little circular letter from the manufacturer of certain sirups, etc., which are to be used for the purpose of blending different kinds of whiskies. I will call attention to enough of it so that Senators may understand the methods which are used and may see that the average blended whisky we may obtain is purely a fraudulent article. It is from the Livingston Laboratory (Limited), in the borough of Brooklyn, a letter of December 21, 1903. It starts as follows:

WATER IS CHEAP.

But it won't make beading oil, nor will it add strength to liquor flavors. So also is methylated spirits—wood alcohol—cheap; and this will add strength and poison also to flavors. And yet the market is full of extracts made up with it by unprincipled people, and quoted at figures below the cost of grain alcohol or refined spirits. Columbia spirits is also much used in making up flavoring extracts, and the manufacturers of this latter strictly say this is not for internal use, while it is a very good substitute for grain alcohol in external purposes.

Here are some of the different ingredients that are sent out to the public, to the saloon keepers generally and the manufacturers of blended whisky, for the purpose of making any kind of liquor they may desire upon a moment's notice. They can make 10-year-old whisky in ten minutes:

SIR: We take the liberty of asking you to investigate a few samples of goods that we feel assured it will be to your advantage to become acquainted with. Our bead oil unxid is a product obtained after much expense and labor. We feel it no boast to say it is the best in the market. It will keep in any climate and improve with age. It will bead in any liquor, of any proof, at any temperature. It has no odor, and is tasteless—does not cloud or blue, or cause liquor to become turbid. An overdose will not harm the liquor. It is extremely soluble and is not necessary to cut in alcohol before using.

Mr. LODGE. If the Senator does not mind, will he enlighten my ignorance by telling me what is the beading of liquor?

Mr. McCUMBER. I believe the Senator knows enough about champagne to make it unnecessary for me to give him special information upon beading.

Mr. LODGE. I ask the Senator in perfectly good faith. I have not the least idea what bead oil or beading is. He is reading this paper, and I ask him in perfectly good faith to explain what is the basis. I have not the faintest idea.

Mr. McCUMBER. It is explained here how to produce a bead in the liquor itself:

It takes one-half to 1 ounce to bead a barrel of 40 gallons of liquor.

Mr. NELSON. If the Senator will allow me, the best illustration I could give as to beading would be to compare still wines with champagne. You notice the difference by the bubbles and the foam.

Mr. LODGE. I understand it when bead is applied to foam, but I did not understand that that is what was being done.

Mr. NELSON. They have some instrument by which they bead.

Mr. LODGE. So as to make it effervescent?

Mr. NELSON. Yes; that is what it does. They bead beer. I have known them to bead beer by putting salaratus in the kegs before filling them with beer, so that the beer, when poured in a glass, would bubble and foam, almost like champagne. That is called beading beer. I think the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. SPOONER] can probably give the Senator from Massachusetts more light on beading beer than I can, as he comes from a great beer State.

Mr. SPOONER. I should like to inquire of the Senator from Minnesota whether he intends to imply by that that I am a beer guzzler——

Mr. NELSON. Nothing of the kind.

Mr. SPOONER. Or that it is simply because I come from Wisconsin?

Mr. NELSON. I simply meant to imply this: I know the Senator is almost a total abstainer. I acquit him of anything like that. What I intended to convey by my remark, which sounds a little unfortunate, is that the Senator comes from one of the great beer-manufacturing States of this Union; and, I take it, every person who has lived in his State knows something about beer.

Mr. SPOONER. The Senator has in mind the beer that makes Milwaukee famous?

Mr. NELSON. Yes, sir.

Mr. McCUMBER. I should like to go on now and show the great profit there is in buying from this firm a little of their bead oil, whereby at a very slight expense you can change whisky worth 60 cents a gallon to that worth one dollar and a half a gallon.

Mr. LODGE. That is just the point I want to get at about bead oil. I understood that it was something to make it effervescent, but the statement which the Senator has just read is that one could change poor whisky into good whisky, or old whisky, by using the bead oil.

Mr. McCUMBER. I will state to the Senator that they have an ingredient that is called "aging oil," rectified for that purpose. Here it states:

It takes one-half to 1 ounce to bead a barrel of 40 gallons of liquor. The nearer to proof the liquor may be, the smaller the quantity of oil required. We quote you the above at $6 per gallon—in 5-gallon lot, $5 per gallon—per quart, $2; per pint, $1.

Now, I will take the next, and that is the oil agene rectified:

Our oil agene rectified we also recommend as a distillation of our own formulas. To give to new liquor or to liquor that has been reduced with water the age desirable. This meets with much favor by those who have used it. One-half to 1 ounce for 40 gallons of liquor. We quote our oil agene rectified at $40 per gallon; per pint, $6.

Mr. LODGE. May I ask the Senator what are these oils?

Mr. McCUMBER. I do not know. They are proprietary.

Mr. LODGE. I did not know whether they might be mineral oils or vegetable oils.

Mr. McCUMBER. I have not the slightest idea what they are.

Mr. LODGE. They are very deleterious, at all events?

Mr. McCUMBER. I do not know. They are fraudulent.

Mr. LODGE. I did not know but that it was some very deleterious and poisonous kind of chemical.

Mr. SPOONER. May I put a question to the Senator from North Dakota for information?
